SEC. 13. And be it further enacted, That the declaration in replevin shall be in the following or equivalent form: the plaintiff sues the defendant for wrongfully and unjustly taking and detaining the said plaintiff's goods and chattels, to wit, of the value of ——— dollars; and the plaintiff claims that the same be taken from the defendant and delivered to him, or that he may have judgment of their value, and all mesne profits and damages, which he estimates at ——— dollars, besides costs; and at the time of filing the declaration the plaintiff, his agent, or attorney shall file an affidavit, sworn to before the clerk, stating, first, that according to the affiant's information and belief the plaintiff is entitled to recover possession of the chattels proposed to be replevied, being the same described in the declaration; second, that the defendant has seized and detained or detains the same; third, that said chattels were not subject to such seizure or detention, and were not taken upon any writ of replevin; and he shall at the same time enter into an undertaking with surety, approved by the clerk, to abide and perform the judgment of the court in the premises.

SEC. 14. And be it further enacted, That if the officer's return of the writ of replevin be that he has served the defendant with copies of the declaration, notice to plead, and summons, but that he could not get possession of the goods and chattels sued for, the plaintiff may prosecute the action for the value of the same and damages for detention; or he may renew the writ in order to get possession of the goods and chattels themselves. If the officer's return be that he has taken possession of the goods and chattels sued for, but that the defendant is not to be found, the court may order that the defendant appear to the action by some fixed day, and of this order the plaintiff shall cause notice to be given by publication in some newspaper of the District at least three times, the first of which shall be at least twenty days before the day fixed for the defendant's appearance; and if the defendant fail to appear the court may proceed as in case of default after personal service.

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That if the defendant appear he may plead not guilty, in which case all special matters of defense may be given in evidence, or he may plead specially.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That whether the defendant plead, and the issue thereon joined is found against him; or his plea is held bad on demurrer; or he makes default after personal service or after publication, the plaintiff's damages shall be ascertained by the jury trying the issue where one is joined, or by a jury of inquest where there is no issue of fact; and those damages shall be the full value of the goods if elcigned by the defendant, including in every case the loss sustained by the plaintiff by reason of the detention; and judgment shall pass for the plaintiff accordingly.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That if the issue be found for the defendant, or the plaintiff dismisses or fails to prosecute his suit, the judgment shall be that the goods, if delivered to the plaintiff, be returned to the defendant, with damages, or, on failure, that the defendant recover against the plaintiff and his surety the damages by him sustained, to be assessed by the jury trying the issue, or, where the plaintiff dismisses or fails to prosecute his suit, by the jury of inquest.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That if the defendant has elcigned the things sued for, the court may instruct the jury, if they find for the plaintiff, to assess such damages as may compel the defendant to return the things; and the judgment shall be that the plaintiff recover against the defendant the value of the goods as found to be discharged by the return of the things with damages for detention, which the jury shall also assess.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That where a suit is brought upon an open account, verified by the plaintiff's or his agent's affidavit, that the amount claimed by the plaintiff is justly payable by the defendant to the plaintiff, and the defendant fails to defend the suit, the plaintiff may have judgment final by default for said amount, with interest from the day specified in the declaration, without an inquiry of damages. If the affidavit be made before an officer of whose authority to administer oaths the court cannot take notice, his authority must be verified by the certificate under official seal, if he have one, of the officer having authority to give such certificate.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That where money is payable by two or more persons jointly or severally, as by joint obligors, covenantors, makers, drawers, or indorsers, one action may be sustained and judgment recovered against all or any of said parties by whom the money is payable at the option of the plaintiff. But an action against one or some of the parties by whom the money is payable may, while the litigation therein continues, be pleaded in bar of another action against another or others of said parties.

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That in case of the sale of things, real or personal, under a decree in equity, the decree confirming the sale shall divest the right, title, or interest sold out of the former owner, partly to the suit, and vest it in the purchaser without any conveyance by the officer or agent of the court conducting the sale. And of this transfer of title the decree shall be notice to all the world when a copy thereof shall be registered among the land records of the District. Nevertheless, the court may order its officer or agent aforesaid to make a conveyance, if that mode be deemed preferable in particular cases.

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That if the declaration state a cause of action of which the court has jurisdiction, but the verdict finds the money payable by the defendant to the plaintiff to be less than the lowest sum of which the court has jurisdiction, the plaintiff shall have judgment for the amount found due to him from the defendant, but without costs.

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That all laws and parts of laws in conflict with these provisions are repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAYNARD. Mr. Speaker, I will not detain the House with the details of this bill. I will simply say that it is, as the House has observed from the reading, a bill regulating or defining questions of practice in the courts. It has been prepared with a great deal of care, upon consultation with legal gentlemen of this District. When the District was organized and the courts first went into operation the old Maryland practice was adopted. Maryland, by subsequent legislation, has advanced her practice; while the practice in the District has remained in many respects stationary. The design of this bill is by legislation to make the practice in this District correspond with the advanced system of practice prevailing in the several States. The bill with the amendments is the result of the joint labors of members of the committee coming from different States and familiar with the respective systems of practice; and the experience and legal knowledge of the committee have been aided by information derived from members of the bar of this District. The bill has been prepared with as much care as the committee could bestow upon it. Now, unless some gentleman desires to ask me a question, I will call for the previous question.

Mr. BROOMALL. Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether I rightly understand the bill to provide for the service of original process by publication so as to bring non-residents within the jurisdiction of the court without actual notice?

Mr. MAYNARD. In cases of attachment, divorce, and when the cause of action is local, as in case of foreclosure of mortgages, enforcing of specific liens, and the like.

Mr. STEVENS. Is this confined to local action?

Mr. MAYNARD. It is, except attachment cases for the collection of debts and divorce.

Mr. BROMALL. I ask whether the judgment in those cases operates in personam or in rem?

Mr. MAYNARD. In cases by attachment for the collection of debts and of divorce the judgment would be in personam; in other cases in the nature of judgments in rem. Not strictly and technically so, perhaps, for proceedings in rem, properly so denominated, bind everybody whether parties or not. The object of this bill is not to originate, but to regulate, the substitution of publication for the service of process. I now demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof, the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. DAWES. I move to amend the title of the bill by adding the words "in relation to judicial proceedings therein," so it will then read, "An act to amend the law of the District of Columbia in relation to judicial proceedings therein."

The amendment was agreed to; and then the title, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. MAYNARD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GRANT OF THE RIGHT OF WAY.

Mr. JULIAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to extend the provisions of the act of August 4, 1852, to all rail and plank roads for the term of five years; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

WASHINGTON COUNTY HORSE RAILROAD.

Mr. MAYNARD, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back Senate bill No. 380, to incorporate the Washington County Horse Railroad Company in the District of Columbia, with the recommendation it do pass.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill; but before it was concluded the morning hour expired, and the bill went over until to-morrow morning.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The SPEAKER stated that the first business in order was the House bill, No. 543, to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights, on which the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. PAINE. The gentleman from Ohio has consented to yield for fifteen minutes to me.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope the House will not take it out of my time; but I yield to the gentleman whether it does or not.

Mr. SPALDING. I object unless it is taken out of my colleague's time.

Mr. BINGHAM. I am under obligation to yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin, and I am sorry my colleague insists it should be counted out of my time.

Mr. PAINE. I ask the Clerk to read the second section of this bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. *And be it further enacted, That the State governments now existing de facto, though illegally formed in the midst of martial law, and in many instances the constitutions were adopted under duress, and not submitted to the ratification of the people, and therefore are not to be treated as free republics, yet they are hereby acknowledged as valid governments for municipal purposes until the same shall be duly altered, and their legislative and executive officers shall be recognized as such.*

Mr. PAINE. Mr. Speaker, I cannot vote for the second section of this bill. Unless it shall be stricken out I shall be compelled to vote against the bill itself. I am not a little surprised that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] should be ready voluntarily to assume this burden of responsibility for the anarchy of murder, robbery, and arson which reigns in these so-called de facto governments which he proposes to recognize as valid for municipal purposes. He may be able to get this fearful burden upon his back, but if he does I warn him of the danger that the sands of his life will all run out before he will be able to shake it off. In this second section he denies that these governments are free republics, and yet he recognizes them as valid governments for municipal purposes until "duly altered." Mark the words: "valid governments for municipal purposes until duly altered." By whom duly altered? By the rebels themselves, on their own motion, or by virtue of congressional legislation? I take it for granted these governments are to be altered in pursuance of congressional legislation, either by virtue of this bill or some other.

But, sir, is the gentleman sure that this plan of reconstruction proposed by the bill will be realized in all of these lately rebellious States? Is he sure that it will ever be realized in one of them? Why, sir, unfortunately this bill is not so framed that it can run alone in the South. Somebody must vote there. These constitutional conventions must have members if they have any existence. Somebody must frame these constitutions if they are framed at all. Now, suppose nobody votes there; suppose no members appear in these constitutional conventions; suppose no constitutions are framed; suppose, in a word, that this southern horse will not drink, even after the gentleman from Pennsylvania shall have led him to water; what then? Will not the gentleman have found himself in a most unfortunate predicament? He will have these piratical governments on his hands voluntarily recognized as valid for municipal purposes until duly altered. He will have gratuitously become a copartner in the guilt which hitherto has rested upon the souls of Andrew Johnson and his northern and southern satellites, but which thenceforth will rest on his soul also until he can contrive duly to alter these governments. And so it will happen that the great Union party to which he belongs, and to which I belong, will become implicated, for how long a time God only knows, in this unspeakable iniquity which daily and hourly cries to Heaven from every rood of rebel soil for vengeance on these monsters. Sir, I shrink back appalled at the temerity of this rash young gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Mr. Speaker, I want to know what occasion there is for any such provision as this in the bill? Not one single function is assigned by this bill to these governments which they are to perform if they are recognized. Why is the gentleman so anxious to share the responsibility and guilt of Andrew Johnson? What occasion have we to recognize these governments at all for any purpose? They play no part in the drama of reconstruction which the gentleman has presented in this bill. Why, then, recognize them? What occasion is there for this gratuitous self-stultification? Why, sir, the diabolical outrages perpetrated under these governments and with their sanction have been daily discussed in this very Chamber. This Hall has been for thirty days fairly blue with the smoke of the righteous wrath and indignation of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and now he proposes to purify the atmosphere by absorbing all the guilt himself—by taking upon his own shoulders the burden of this guilt. Mr. Speaker, I cannot tell what load of sin long experience may enable the gentleman to stagger under, but I know full well that my own shoulders are neither broad enough nor strong enough to bear up any portion of this guilt. If twelve or eighteen months ago he had proposed to recognize these governments there might now be some excuse for him. If he had done so then, and we should now, in view of the anarchy which runs riot at the South, upbraid him for what he then did, he might very well say to us, "Gentlemen, I did not foresee these horrors." But now he has actually seen them. Why, sir, he has made this Hall ring with his malediction hurled at these pretended governments; and he undertakes to make us, as well as himself, partners in their guilt.

This bill goes into effect in May next, four months hence. He has waited already more than twenty months for reconstruction without recognizing these governments as valid for any purpose. He can wait for four months longer. If he cannot, I can. The gentleman from Pennsylvania often lectures, with or without cause, my distinguished friend from the Cleveland district [Mr. SPALDING] for wandering away from the true faith in search of presidential bread and butter; but, sir, time may disclose what presidential bread and butter the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania has singly hidden away here under the second section of this bill.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I understand the gentleman from Wisconsin to infer that the venerable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] is expected to be appointed by the President postmaster of some village in Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Mr. PAINE. I have no authentic information of that fact, but I think the expectation might be justified by the second section of this bill. [Laughter.] Sir, I was about to say that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] might well say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS:] "First cast out the beam out of thine own eye, and then shalt thou see clearly to cast the mote out of thy brother's eye."

I thank the gentleman from the Cadiz district of Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] for yielding me a portion of his time.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, the two bills now pending before the House, and which I have moved to commit to the Committee on Reconstruction, are, first the bill introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] without the sanction of any committee, and by way of substitute for the bill originally reported by the Committee on Reconstruction; and the other is the bill reported from the Committee on the Territories by my colleague, [Mr. ASHLEY.]

In all that I may say to-day, Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be understood as seeking to enforce upon the House any plan of my own. I desire merely to call the attention of the House to the attempts made by these two measures to induce the House to depart from what has hitherto been agreed upon by the Committee on Reconstruction; what has hitherto been done and sanctioned by the Thirty-Ninth Congress; what has hitherto been done and sanctioned by the people through the public press, in their primary assemblies, at the ballot-box, and finally what is now being done, and conclusively done, by the people of the organized States through their legislative assemblies. Neither, sir, do I intend to be understood, in anything I may say here to-day, as attempting to limit by any poor words of mine the sovereignty and power of the people of the United States to take such security as, in their judgment, they may deem effectual for the future safety of the Republic and the protection of the rights of all the people of the Republic. It is because I insist upon that right of the people—a right that belongs alone to the people, and which can be exercised effectively only by the people—that I oppose the legislation contemplated by the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and by my colleague, [Mr. ASHLEY.]

While there are many, and, in my judgment, weighty objections to these bills, that just stated is not the least of them. I challenge these bills to-day, in the presence of the House of Representatives and in the presence of the nation, as a substantial denial of the right of the great people who have saved this Republic by arms to save it by fundamental law—law emanating from the people, law resting upon the sovereign will of the people alone, law beyond the power of this Congress or of any subsequent Congress by mere legislative enactments to repeal or in any manner limit or restrict. Standing upon this proposition of the right and duty of the people to settle for themselves this great question, which involves the future of the nation, the life and stability of American institutions, I ask the House to consider what has been done thus far upon the subject of restoration and the public safety by the Committee on Reconstruction, by the Congress by which that committee was appointed, and after them by the people themselves? First, sir, that committee, reflecting, as I believe, the will of the House and the Senate as well as the judgment of the people of the organized States of this Union, came to the conclusion that there was no future safety for the Republic, no security against a future rebellion similar to that which has recently rocked the continent and filled all good men in this land and in other lands with fears of the failure of this great experiment of republican government, but by incorporating in the Constitution itself such a provision as would protect in all the hereafter the rights of every citizen and every State by the combined power of the whole people.

To that end that committee prepared an article of amendment to the Constitution of the United States, and submitted it to the consideration of this House and of the Senate. That article of amendment is substantially that all persons born in this land, within the jurisdiction of the United States, without regard to complexion or previous condition, are citizens of the Republic; that no State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States; that no State shall deprive any person of life or liberty or property without due process of law; that no State shall deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws; that representation hereafter among these States shall be apportioned according to the whole number of representative population in each; that those who have violated official oaths to support the Constitution of the United States shall be ineligible to any office, civil or military, State or national, until such disability shall be removed by act of Congress; that neither the United States nor any State of this Union shall ever assume or pay any debt contracted in aid of the late rebellion or make compensation for slaves; and that the debt contracted in defense of the nation's life shall be forever inviolable; and crowning all with the grand, comprehensive grant of power, that the Congress of the United States shall be authorized by appropriate legislation to enforce this provision.

Mr. Speaker, I stand here to-day filled with the conviction, as strong as knowledge or that light which comes direct from heaven, that the future safety of this people depends in some sort upon the incorporation into their Constitution of that great amendment. If it had been there from the beginning, you never in my judgment would have been troubled with the late rebellion.

Now, it is attempted to be said here, and elsewhere, too, that it was not the conclusion of the joint Committee on Reconstruction of the Senate and the House of Representatives that this amendment was to be made the basis of reconstruction. I beg leave to remind the House and to remind the country that that was the very conclusion to which that committee did come, and which they reported to the House and Senate. As evidence of this, sir, I refer to the bill which was reported by order of that committee, and as a substitute for which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has interposed the bill which is now pending before the House. That committee reported at the last session a bill together with the constitutional amendment, and which bill is as follows:

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the above-recited amendment shall have become part of the Constitution of the United States, and any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the same, and shall have modified its constitution and laws in conformity therewith, the Senators and Representatives from such State, if found duly elected and qualified, may, after having taken the required oaths of office, be admitted into Congress as such."

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That when any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the foregoing amendment to the Constitution, any part of the direct tax under the act of August 5, 1861, which may remain due and unpaid in such State, may be assumed and paid by such State; and the payment thereof, upon proper assurances from such State, to be given to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, may be postponed for a period not exceeding ten years from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. STEVENS. Will the gentleman allow me to say that that bill was not reported in connection with the present pending amendment; but it was reported in connection with an amendment which was defeated.

Mr. BINGHAM. I understand the gentleman exactly. That bill was reported in connection with the pending amendment, every word of it substantially, except this: the third section of that amendment as it now stands was reported by the committee as a bill subject to modification by a majority of Congress, which by the amendment may be modified in its effect by Congress, two thirds assenting thereto. There was another section which the Congress rejected, in my judgment wisely rejected; that was the section which disqualified rebels from voting for members of Congress or electors for President and Vice President until 1870.

It will not do for the gentleman to say that that bill ceased to operate as a declaration of the judgment of the joint Committee on Reconstruction, when the fact is on record that every member of that committee in this House and in the Senate voted to strike out the third section of the amendment and incorporate in its stead what was before reported by the committee, as I have already said, in the form of a bill imposing the disability to hold office, military or civil, State or national, upon those who had broken official oaths to the United States to engage in rebellion. I stand upon the proposition that the Congress by that vote did give out this amendment to the people of the United States as the future basis of reconstruction; and further, that every member representing the Union party upon the joint Committee on Reconstruction, by recording his vote in the Senate and in the House of Representatives in favor of the substitution of the third section of the amendment as it now is for the third section as it was originally reported, thereby, declared the amendment, as it now is, the basis of reconstruction as provided in the bill reported by that committee, and is bound to stand by his record so made if he would be consistent. Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States so understood and accepted it. There are gentlemen here, not a few I undertake to say, who owe their reelection to the Fortieth Congress to the fact that the Union State conventions in the States which they represent upon this floor declared their acceptance of this constitutional amendment, in manner and form as it now stands, as a condition of future restoration.

In saying this I am not saying that either directly or indirectly or by implication this restricts, in any manner or form, the power of the Congress of the United States in the mean time to pass such laws as may be necessary for the protection of life and liberty and property throughout the lately insurgent States. To me nothing can be clearer than that the power so to legislate over those States, until their due reorganization and restoration, is in the Congress of the United States and nowhere else. It is precisely because I believe that the sovereignty of the nation is alone in the organized constitutional States of this Union, maintaining their relations to the Federal Government, and represented in the Congress of the United States, that I claim the existence of the power in this Congress, first, to propose to the several States so organized this amendment to the Constitution for their ratification; and second, to pass and enforce within the lately insurgent States for the time being all laws not inconsistent with the provisions of the Constitution of the United States for the protection, throughout those States, of every person in his rights of life, liberty, and property. This is no new opinion with me, but a conviction uttered in my place here five years since and early in the rebellion. Time and the action of every department of the Government have only confirmed me in it.

Sir, the gentleman's bill, while it conflicts with the constitutional amendment, totally ignores the first duty of the Congress of the United States, to give the protection of law to life and property in disorganized States. I listened, sir, with due attention to the gentleman's carefully prepared remarks. I weighed his words. I know that his heart was right when he said that it was fit and proper that those who are without the protection of law in disorganized States should have the protection of law, and that right speedily. But I challenge the gentleman, and I challenge any advocate of his bill, to the issue that I make to-day; that his bill gives no protection of law or color of protection which those people have not now. It gives no protection to anybody, loyal or disloyal, in any State.

Because of that I may be pardoned for opposing the bill, as also for the reason before stated that it is a clear, palpable departure from the intent and letter of your constitutional amendment. The bill, in my judgment, is framed in the spirit of the utterances of a distinguished man of this country who has been waging war on this amendment and this Congress, denouncing both as a "swindle," and asking the swindling Congress to "fling the swindling amendment out of the window."

I see in the legislation thus attempted to be initiated by the gentleman from Pennsylvania the inauguration of that movement, and I for one stand here to enter my protest against it. Let the future safety of this Republic—I ask it in the name of my afflicted country—rest upon guarantees embedded in the Constitution by the sovereign act of the people, and not upon repealable acts of Congress or parchment contracts entered into by Congress with insurgent and disorganized States. I submit with all confidence that what is contemplated by the gentleman's bill is to patch up a restoration by the usurpation of powers which do not belong to the Congress of the United States, induce the people to fling aside the constitutional amendment, and thereby subject the future of this Republic to all those dread calamities which have darkened its recent past.

Mr. Speaker, I may be pardoned, before I proceed further with the consideration of these bills, if I attempt in a few short words to fortify what I have said of the power of Congress to present the pending amendment, the power of the loyal organized States here represented to ratify it and make it part of the Constitution of the United States, and the power of Congress in the mean time to protect person and property in these insurgent States. May it not be safely affirmed that the American nationality as a political organization never existed an hour but by means of organized State governments? Your Constitution began to be through that instrumentality, and it has continued to be through that instrumentality. I do not lose sight of that other fact, that, notwithstanding the division of this people into States under the Constitution, they are nevertheless one people, with one Constitution, one country, and one destiny. But still, sir, their political power as one people is primarily exercisable under the Constitution of the United States only through and by organized constitutional State governments. There can be no representative body of the people of the United States in Congress save through organized State governments and elections therein held. There can be no senatorial body of the legislative power of this nation save by the direct act of legislative assemblies in organized States. There can be no election of a Chief Magistrate of the United States save through electors appointed in such manner as the Legislature of the respective States may direct, and in default of an election by the State electors the election can only be had by the Representatives of States of the United States in the House of Representatives voting by States, the Representatives from each State having but one vote.

This being so, it necessarily results, notwithstanding the strange utterances that have been heard in another place from a distinguished Senator, that the people of organized States of the Union who maintain their constitutional relations to the Government of the United States, and only the people of such organized States of this Union, are the nation. This proposition has of late been denied, I regret to say, in the interests of those who lately waged war against the Government. I repeat, there is no American nationality without States of the Union duly organized and maintaining constitutional relations to the Government of the United States in conformity with the Constitution of the United States. It therefore must be that when in the late rebellion the people of the insurrectionary States organized conspiracy and took up arms against the Government of the United States, though they failed, thank God, to overturn the fabric of American empire, though they failed to sweep away the supremacy of the American Constitution, though they failed to denationalize the American people, and to blot that people from the map of nations, they did succeed in overturning their own local constitutional State governments; and thenceforward to this moment (except in restored Tennessee) they had and have no power to legislate upon any subject affecting the life, liberty, or property of an American citizen, save by the sufferance of the American nation represented in the Congress of the United States. The rights of a people to be recognized as such and to act as such can only exist under legal organizations. To use the words of Burke:

"When men, therefore, break up the original compact or agreement which gives its corporate form and capacity to a State, they are no longer a people; they have no longer a corporate existence; they have no longer a legal coercive force to bind within, nor a claim to be recognized abroad. They are a number of vague, loose individuals, and nothing more. With them all is to begin again. Alas! they little know how many a weary step is to be taken before they can form themselves into a mass which has a true political personality."—Burke's Works, vol. iii, p. 82.

The conclusion is irresistible that the rebel States by their rebellion ceased to possess the power or legal coercive force for local State government. When a State of this Union becomes thus disorganized the power of government therein is exclusively in the Government of the United States. The jurisdiction of the United States Government within the limits of this Republic is nowhere, either by the letter of the Constitution or by any intendment of the Constitution, limited or restricted for the general purposes of legislation except by the presence of an organized constitutional State government. It therefore is that, from the day treason did its work in South Carolina to this hour, the legislative power of the United States was as exclusive within the State of South Carolina as it is this moment within the District of Columbia. So it must remain, and so it will remain until South Carolina is restored to her constitutional relations with this Government by the reorganization of a constitutional State government acceptable to the American people and made valid by the approval of Congress.

If this be so, Mr. Speaker, it follows that this Congress of the United States had full power, without the consent and against the consent of every insurrectionary State in this land, to propose the pending amendment to the Constitution to all the organized States of this Union for ratification. There is, there can be, in my opinion, no question of this. But it does not follow from this that the people of each of those States may not reorganize their local State governments destroyed by their rebellion, and ratify the pending amendment with the consent of this Government. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] pronounced this absurd.

Sir, the joint Committee on Reconstruction held otherwise when they reported the bill which I have read, and therein provided that whenever the amendment shall have become part of the Constitution, and any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the same, &c., such State should be entitled to representation in Congress. The framers of our Government also differed from the gentleman from Pennsylvania in this behalf. When this Government was organized under the Constitution, there were but eleven States in this Union. North Carolina and Rhode Island were not members of it. They were not represented in that First Congress which organized in 1789 in New York. They had no voice in the election of the first Executive of the nation. They were not in the Union or of the Union. Yet, sir, after this Government was organized, after the Congress had enacted laws, and especially the judiciary act, these States not in the Union, or of the Union, did ratify and accept the Constitution of the United States, and thereupon were admitted to representation in Congress. Upon their admission in June, 1790—a year after the first meeting of Congress—by special enactments the judiciary act of the United States was extended to each of those new States, the Congress thereby confessing that organized States not in the Union or of the Union might ratify the Constitution, and, by Congress subsequently assenting thereto, the ratification became valid upon the admission of such States to representation. It is no answer to say they were original States, and might ratify by force of the Constitution itself. The provision of the Constitution conferring power on the original States to ratify only applied to such of the States, not less than nine, as ratified before the Constitution was established and the Government organized under it. Hence it was that when those two States were admitted after the Government had been organized the previous legislation of Congress was extended over them.

To ratify a constitutional amendment is the exercise of the power of a State of the Union. So also is the election of Representatives and Senators of the United States. Many of the States now in the Union exercised powers of States before admission and preparatory to their admission as States. They formed constitutions of State government, elected Legislatures, chose Senators, which, under your Constitution, can only be done by a Legislature of a State. The moment the Congress of the United States, by admitting into the Union these new States, affirmed what was thus done by them in advance of their admission, and thereby those acts become as valid as any lawful acts done by them as States after their admission. If Congress had rejected the new States of course their acts as States were void and of no effect.

So I submit the people of the insurrectionary States may proceed with the work of reorganizing State governments, the formation of a constitution, the election of a Legislature, and the formal ratification of the constitutional amendment and all that they do in that behalf may by the subsequent act of the national sovereignty by resolution be made valid.

Let those States ratify the amendment, and thereby give some evidence of a fitness and desire to be restored to the equal powers of organized States in the Union.

Instead of discouraging them as the gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes, and denying them the privilege even of petition for admission, let us stand upon the declaration of the joint committee that those disorganized States may ratify the amendment and that they ought to ratify it. Yet I reaffirm distinctly here, and do not wish to be misunderstood about it, that those insurrectionary States have no power whatever as States of this Union, and cannot lawfully restrain for a single moment that great body of freemen who cover this continent from ocean to ocean, now organized States of the Union and represented here, in their fixed purpose and undoubted legal right to incorporate the amendment into the Constitution of the United States.

But, say some, there are two departments of the Government against this asserted power of the people of the organized States, the executive and judicial. My answer is, neither of these departments has any voice in the matter—no right to challenge the authority of the people. I have no concern or care for any influence which the President may seek to exert. He is powerless with the people. He can in no way reverse their final judgment. But we are told the Supreme Court of the United States will strike down this amendment, if ratified by three fourths of the organized and represented States and declared duly ratified by authority of an act of this Congress.

I do not share in the fears thus expressed. That supreme tribunal of justice has no power in the premises. It is not a judicial question; it is a political question in the decision of which the Supreme Court can in no wise interfere. Gentlemen might as well claim that the Supreme Court might inquire into the question whether the State of Ohio, for example, is one of the States of this Union. That is a question decided by the sovereignty of the nation in Congress assembled, and when so decided the decision is final and conclusive upon every judicial tribunal in the land, Federal and State.

The Supreme Court of the United States to undertake to adjudge the power of Congress to propose a constitutional amendment and the power of the people to affirm it! A Congress competent to enact laws is competent to propose amendments to the Constitution, and the States competent to elect a lawful Congress are competent to ratify a constitutional amendment proposed by such Congress.

Whether a State of this Union has levied war against the United States or has a republican constitutional State government, or is entitled to representation in Congress, or to choose electors for President and Vice President of the United States, or can rightfully exercise any of the powers of an organized State of the Union, are political not judicial questions, and can be decided only by the political department, the law-making power of the United States, and from that decision there is no appeal, and there exists no power of reversal save in the people at large. <Even the Supreme Court has always affirmed this. That tribunal so affirmed in Luther vs. Borden; it again so affirmed in the prize cases. But, sir, if that tribunal had never so affirmed no intelligent man at all conversant with the Constitution of the United States and the relations of the original States at the time of its adoption, and the mode and manner in which the Government of the United States was organized under it, could for a moment doubt that the action of the people over the political power of States and the relations of States was conclusive upon the judiciary, Federal and State.

Let the amendment be ratified by three fourths of the organized and represented States and it is in vain that conspirators and aiders of rebellion will appeal to the Supreme Court to relieve them from the righteous and just provisions of the great decree of the people. Sir, the power of the people, organized under twenty-six constitutional State governments and represented in Congress, to amend the Constitution of the United States and enact laws for the common defense and general welfare of the United States, and make treaties and declare war, and raise and support armies and navies, cannot be made a question in the Supreme Court or elsewhere, for it has been settled and forever closed both by the sword and the ballot. It is idle to suggest a reversal by the Supreme Court of the judgment of the people of these organized States of the Union, either upon the question of their constitutional power to crush and subjugate armed rebellion by arms, or of their constitutional power to govern insurgent and disorganized States by laws, statute and fundamental.

<The Supreme Court, therefore, cannot very well at this time of day raise the question whether the Thirty-Ninth Congress of the United States is a competent body to enact laws or propose amendments, as was done by the Thirty-Eighth Congress, representing the same States. If the court should be of that mind, it had better upon quo warranto proceed to determine whether we have a right to legislate upon any question whatever, for a Congress that can lawfully legislate can lawfully propose amendments, and States that can lawfully elect the Congress can lawfully ratify amendments to the Constitution of the United States.

The original jurisdiction of that court is very restricted, as gentlemen well know, by the terms of the Constitution. Their appellate jurisdiction, both by the text of the Constitution and by every decision which that court ever made, depends exclusively upon the will of Congress. If, therefore, gentlemen are at all apprehensive of any wrongful intervention of the Supreme Court in this behalf, sweep away at once their appellate jurisdiction in all cases, and leave the tribunal without even color or appearance of authority for their wrongful intervention. Do this, and let that court hereafter sit to try only questions affecting ambassadors, other public ministers and consuls, and questions in which a State shall be a party, as that is the beginning and end of its original jurisdiction. By the ruling of that court thus restricted we may safely conclude that they will decide as heretofore, that the clause giving original jurisdiction in cases in which a State shall be a party only applies to those States that are members of the Union. <If, however, the court usurps power to decide political questions and defy a free people's will it will only remain for a people thus insulted and defied to demonstrate that the servant is not above his lord by procuring a further constitutional amendment and ratifying the same, which will defy judicial usurpation by annihilating the usurpers in the abolition of the tribunal itself.

Sir, I beg pardon for exhausting so much of the time and patience of the House as I have already done in trying to make clear this proposition of the power of Congress to propose amendments to the Constitution and to decide finally the question of the ratification thereof, as well as to legislate for the nation. It needs no argument. The legislative power of the nation is in the representatives of the organized constitutional States of this Union; and what are organized constitutional States of this Union is clearly defined in your Constitution, namely: first, those that originally assented to that instrument, having been previously States, and thereby organized the Government under it; and which still sustain their constitutional relations to it and have not forfeited or broken the same; second, those new States that were afterward admitted by acts of Congress and have not since disorganized and revolted. > All such States, thus once in the Union and continuing to be organized constitutional States of the Union, and only such, are entitled to representation in Congress or to exercise any of the powers reserved to the States of the Union by the Constitution. By the express terms of the Constitution there is, there can be no constitutional States in this Union save States duly admitted, obedient to the Constitution and laws of the United States, whose governments are republican, and all of the legislative, executive, and judicial officers of which are bound by an oath to support the Constitution of the United States. Thus, sir, it is written. <A State without executive, legislative, or judicial officers bound by an oath to support the Constitution of the United States is not a State in this Union or of this Union for local or municipal purposes. It simply remains a State in the Union and of the Union, despite its treason and rebellion, for Federal purposes—that is, for Federal Government; and it is because the late insurgent States sustain this relation that your joint Committee on Reconstruction recognizes the fitness and propriety of the people of those States reorganizing constitutional governments in conformity with the provisions of the proposed amendment, now that their illegal Governments de facto, established in rebellion, have been stricken down by the sword.

And here, sir, is the point at which I take my departure from the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania. His bill is framed upon the idea, which he has expressed more than once in this body, that the people of these insurrectionary States are a foreign nationality, that they are alien enemies. This position the gentleman has attempted more than once here to fortify by reference to the utterances of the Supreme Court of the United States in what are known as the prize cases. I beg leave to say, notwithstanding the gentleman's reiteration of that statement, that the court never made any such decision. The language of the court was most carefully worded. They decided that during the war, the great public, solemn war waged by the Government of the United States against this armed insurrection, the Government of the United States had a right, upon its own election, to treat the insurgent States as though they were a foreign nationality—not that they were so; not that the Government declared that they were so; not that the Government ever intimated by recognizing in them the rights of belligerents that they were foreign nationalities, but that, in the assertion of the nation's rights and to crush rebellion by arms, the Government of the United States might of its own election for the time being recognize them as entitled to the rights of belligerents, and treat them as though they were foreign nationalities. The words of the court are, "they were enemies, though not foreigners." Sir, I will not with my present convictions, under whatever pressure, here or elsewhere, assent to any legislation which on its face recognizes the gentleman's dogma as that at any time from the hour when treason fired its first gun on Fort Sumter to the present moment any rood of the Republic was discovered from the rest and made foreign territory.

The States lately in rebellion were and still are within the jurisdiction of the United States; and therefore it results, notwithstanding their treason, that the moment the Government of the United States by force of arms was able to establish within the lines of South Carolina its courts of justice, it might hold any rebel or other criminal against its laws to answer at the bar of its own courts without being charged with any departure from the Constitution, which expressly requires that all persons tried for crime against the laws of the United States must be held to answer in the State and district, previously prescribed by law, in which his crime was committed.

Why, sir, the gentleman's bill and the gentleman's hypothesis would operate as a general jail delivery. All the murderers, all the assassins, all the poisoners of our captured prisoners anywhere within the rebel States, are to go unwhipped of justice at the bar of our tribunals, because, forsooth, their crimes were not committed within a State of the Union and a judicial district in such State previously prescribed by law. The gentleman so understands it himself; and therefore I may be pardoned for reminding him and the country that in his carefully-prepared remarks he scouted the idea of holding anybody to answer for treason who participated in the late rebellion within the rebel States. He said that it was utterly impossible. Well, if it is impossible it is because the nation, by its own action, chose to estop itself in that behalf by granting them the rights of belligerents. The impossibility does not arise from anything that treason did or attempted to do within the limits of those States and the jurisdiction of the United States.

Having said this, I will now proceed, as briefly as I may be able, to consider more in detail the provisions of the gentleman's bill. And the first remark that I have to make is that this bill is very offensive to me in this: that it is an attempt to restrict the right of petition in the people of the several late insurrectionary States. Why, sir, in the government of our common Father the poorest worm that crawls is given the right of petition, and under the Government of our fathers it has been wisely ordained that the Congress of the United States shall pass no law abridging the right of the people peaceably to assemble and petition Congress for the redress of grievances. This bill, from first to last, as though it were the utterance of an unlimited and crowned dictator, says that a million men in this land shall not peaceably assemble and petition this Government.

I know it is very easy for men to say that traitors have no rights which we are entitled to respect. If I were to concede that, it does not result that the Constitution of the United States has authorized the Congress of the United States to decitizenize a single man in the Republic by act of Congress; and yet, lest gentlemen may think that I am forcing by implication something that is not contained in the text, I will quote from the bill:

That all persons who, on the 4th day of March, 1861, were of full age, who held office, either civil or military, under the government called the "confederate States of America," or who swore allegiance to said government, are hereby declared to have forfeited their citizenship and to have renounced allegiance to the United States, and shall not be entitled to exercise the elective franchise or hold office until five years after they shall have filed their intention or desire to be reinvested with the right of citizenship, and shall swear allegiance to the United States and renounce allegiance to all other governments or pretended governments.

What is the organization of government by the people within any of the Territories of the United States where there exists no accepted constitutional State governments and a presentation thereof to the Congress of the United States asking its approval but the simple exercise of the right of petition? And yet the gentleman puts into this bill a provision "that the eleven States lately in rebellion, except Tennessee, may form valid State governments in the following manner," and subject to the foregoing forfeiture and denial of right. Sir, the people of those States have the right to form State governments and to submit them to the Congress of the United States without any enabling act. Congress has the right, I admit, to aid them in the exercise of this privilege by an enabling act.

But I submit to this House, and I submit to that great body of freemen represented by this House, that the Congress of the United States has no color of authority for providing by law, first, that a million persons, natural-born male citizens of this Republic and resident therein, are no longer citizens of the United States; and next, that the people of the ten States lately in insurrection may not form a constitution of State government otherwise than as provided in and through this bill; and yet this bill so declares, and then proceeds as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the State governments now existing de facto, though illegally formed in the midst of martial law, and in many instances the constitutions were adopted under duress, and not submitted to the ratification of the people, and therefore are not to be treated as free republics, yet they are hereby acknowledged as valid governments for municipal purposes until the same shall be duly altered, and their legislative and executive officers shall be recognized as such.

I thank my venerable friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] for granting even this much of law to that people. For, excepting this section, which my excellent friend from Wisconsin [Mr. PAINÉ] assailed, both the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and the bill of my colleague, [Mr. J. M. ASHLEY,] reported from the Committee on Territories, give those people no protection of law at all; none whatever. In saying this, I am not unmindful, sir, of the fact that this bill does provide for conventions to assemble in June next. But in the mean time it gives nobody, loyal or disloyal, any protection of law whatever, except such as they may have by and through these illegally organized State governments.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. What remedy do you propose in place of that?

Mr. BINGHAM. I stated in the outset of my remarks that it was not my purpose to attempt to enforce upon this House any particular plan of my own in regard to this subject, but only to ask the House to refer these bills to the joint Committee on Reconstruction for consideration. But as my friend has asked me what remedy I would propose, I will state that it is simply this: I would give remedy by law in United States courts in all cases if these State governments are not sufficient for the efficient protection of life and property therein. I have no doubt there is something of good in those governments, and that good may come from such a provision as that which the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has incorporated in his bill, declaring those organized State governments to be valid for municipal purposes, and declaring that all persons shall recognize the official officers thereof; still I am not prepared to say that there is not much in those State governments which is in conflict with the Constitution of the United States, and which ought to be corrected; and, therefore, in answer to the question of my colleague, I will say that while I would accept legislation of that sort for the time being, if I may be allowed to make a suggestion, I would, instead of that, provide complete and efficient protection for all without respect to persons or previous condition in such tribunals of justice as Congress may see fit to establish there, either directly or by recognizing the tribunals now there. That is my answer to the gentleman; and if that is not deemed advisable I would adopt any other method which this House, after due consideration, may determine to be more effectual to protect all the interests of all the people of that section.

Now, I beg leave to return to the bill. The sixth section, as I have already said, declares something like a million men no longer citizens of the Republic on the grounds which I have stated. That in my opinion is a very clear departure from the provision of the constitutional amendment, which imposed no disability upon persons by reason of their participation in the rebellion, save their disability to hold office until such disability shall be removed by act of Congress. But what does the gentleman propose to do by this section of the bill? He proposes to disfranchise as well as to decitizenize them for the period of five years. That is precisely what every Senator declared should not be done when at the last session the third section of the amendment as reported to this House against my protest was struck out by the unanimous vote of the Senate; and it is precisely what this House declared should not be done, the gentleman himself assenting when at the last session the House concurred with the Senate in striking out that provision.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would ask the gentleman if he recognizes the right of citizens of this Government to throw off their allegiance?

Mr. BINGHAM. Not at all, while they remain within its jurisdiction.

Mr. MAYNARD. I am not asking that question. I would like an answer to the question in the exact terms in which I put it.

Mr. BINGHAM. Well, if the gentleman is asking me whether I recognize the right of self-expatriation, I answer that I think the Government of the United States settled that right upon the seas about fifty years ago by battle.

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman allow me then to ask him whether, in his judgment, the men who went into the rebellion did not, by connecting themselves with a foreign government, by every act of which they were capable, denude themselves of their citizenship—whether they are not to be held and taken by this Government now as men denuded of their citizenship, having no rights as citizens except such as the legislative power of this Government may choose to confer upon them? In other words: is not the question on our part one of enfranchisement, not of disfranchisement?

Mr. BINGHAM. I thought that what I had already said would have been deemed a sufficient answer to the gentleman's inquiry.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the gentleman's pardon. I had not the opportunity of hearing his whole speech.

Mr. BINGHAM. But, Mr. Speaker, if the House will pardon me for touching again upon that of which I have already spoken, I have no objection to answering still more fully for the gentleman's satisfaction. I say, as I said before in the progress of this argument, that the people of a State who engage in armed revolt against the Government of the United States, within the jurisdiction of the United States, can no longer, except by the consent of the sovereign authority of this nation, exercise the powers of an organized State within the Government, and are therefore subject, until they are restored to the powers of a State organization, to the exclusive legislation of the Congress of the United States. But their treason and revolt does not make them a foreign nationality, nor put them or the States in which they reside beyond the jurisdiction of the United States, nor absolve them from their allegiance to this Government, nor make the faithful, law-abiding citizens of their States alien enemies and traitors.

But, sir, when the gentleman interrupted me, I was remarking that the Congress of the United States has already indicated to the people of the United States the disabilities it proposes to impose upon the persons who were engaged in the rebellion; and that disability is a disqualification to hold any office, civil or military, State or national, until such time as the disability may be removed by act of Congress. I propose, sir, to stand upon that, and abide by it.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAWSON obtained the floor.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BINGHAM] will be allowed to proceed.

Mr. DAWSON. If it be the pleasure of the House to give the gentleman additional time I will yield with pleasure, provided that the time he may occupy shall not be deducted from the hour to which I am entitled.

Mr. BINGHAM. I would like the indulgence of the House for a short time longer.

Mr. STEVENS. I understand there are some twenty gentlemen who desire to speak. I shall not object to extending the time of the gentleman from Ohio; but this is the last extension of time to which I will consent in the discussion of this bill.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I will not object to an extension of fifteen minutes; I must object to an indefinite extension.

Mr. BANKS. I hope there will be no objection to letting the gentleman speak for an hour longer, if he desires that much time. Let him conclude his speech.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] objects to that. Is there any objection to an extension of fifteen minutes?

No objection was made.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Speaker, my objection to this sixth section imposing these additional disabilities rests upon the grounds I have already intimated. I hold that it is an interference in the first place with the right of petition in that people. Although they were traitors, they have "the right peaceably to assemble and petition the Government for a redress of grievances." In addition to that, it is a clear departure from the letter and spirit of that great amendment which we have submitted to the people of this country for their approval and ratification, and which has already received the final ratification of the Legislatures representing not less than twelve millions of the people of this nation. That amendment clearly imports that they may vote. Sir, it imposes no legal disability upon any person lately engaged in the rebellion South other than the disability to which I referred before, ineligibility to office, military or civil, until such disability be removed by act of Congress. The amendment places all those persons in every other respect on an equal footing with their fellow-citizens, and by express intent, having placed this sole disability upon them, proclaims to them and to the world that by their acceptance and ratification of the amendment under a constitutional State government they may be restored as States to the Union, in which event they shall not be denied the elective franchise within their States respectively. I propose to stand by that amendment.

The gentleman's answer would be to the effect if the amendment is adopted and made part of the Constitution, his bill if passed simply falls. That is a strong reason with me why his bill should not be enacted into law in advance. The probability of the speedy ratification of the amendment by the requisite number of States is a reason for the reference of the bill to the joint Committee on Reconstruction for consideration until the American people decide the great question whether they will place this limitation upon our power.

But, sir, there is a further provision in this bill to which I ask the attention of the House, and that is the provision of the fourth section. I think a more monstrous atrocity never was presented in the form of legislation to the American Congress for its consideration. It is that—

No person shall be deprived of the right to vote, or otherwise disfranchised, by reason of conviction and punishment for any crime other than for insurrection or treason or misprision of treason.

In order to understand the effect of this let me read from the eighth section. It is there provided—

That whenever the foregoing conditions shall be complied with the citizens of said State may present said constitution to Congress; and if the same shall be approved by Congress said State shall be declared entitled to the rights, privileges, and immunities, and be subject to all the obligations and liabilities of a State within the Union.

What conditions, sir? Why the foregoing conditions in the provisions of the bill: a constitution of State government which upon its face shall declare that no person for crime shall be denied the elective franchise or be otherwise disfranchised within the State, save persons convicted of insurrection, treason, or misprision of treason. What is this but asking this Congress to say in advance, if the insurgent States shall so frame their constitutions of State government, that thieves, robbers, and assassins shall never be deprived of the right of the elective franchise it will be approved; otherwise their constitutions will be rejected. The bill will bear no other construction than this.

It is no objection with me that the bill secures, in the election of delegates to frame a constitution of government, to all male citizens over twenty-one years of age, without regard to race or color, the right to vote. But it is an insuperable objection to this bill that it is decreed of perpetual obligation upon the State and nation never to be altered or abrogated; and that only in pursuance of its conditions can a State be admitted to representation or be permitted to retain representatives in Congress after admission.

Mr. Speaker, while I am willing to exert all the essential powers of this Government as it now stands in protection of life, liberty, and property in the insurgent States, to govern them, if need be, as they now are for years, I will never, with my present conviction of duty, incorporate by law upon the statute-book of this Union a provision which knocks out the corner-stone of the fabric of American Government.

I do not forget, sir, the words of Washington, transmitted to us. When about to surrender his public trusts he declared "the basis of our political systems is the 'right of the people to make and alter their constitutions of government.'"

The gentleman, doubtless for humane purposes, puts into this bill, in the seventh section, a provision that—

All laws shall be impartial without regard to language, race, or former condition. If the provisions of this section should ever be altered, repealed, expunged, or in any way abrogated, this act shall become void and said State lose its right to be represented in Congress.

I do not propose myself to support any such legislation, for the reason that with my present convictions the Congress of the United States has neither the power nor color of power to do this. It is in vain that gentlemen say it is only to protect the freedmen in their rights. God knows I am ready to go as far as he who goes the farthest under your exclusive legislative power in those disorganized States, and of which I have already spoken, to protect every one of them in all their rights: the right to enjoy the fruits of their toil; the right peaceably to assemble and petition this Government for a redress of grievances; the right to participate in the reorganization of the governments of the insurgent States; but I am not going, under the pretense of a mawkish humanity, under the pretense of throwing guards about the sacred right of liberty, to take away the right of a free people to amend and alter their constitutional government at their pleasure, subject only to the limitations of the Constitution of my country.

What does the seventh section say? "All laws shall be impartial, without regard to language, race, or former condition." Why, sir, in its fullness and extent it is a declaration by statute in advance that these States shall not exclude from the right of suffrage or from office aliens in their midst, and not merely aliens, but men who come in their midst as paid spies or hirelings of foreign Governments; because, forsooth, they are come of another race or speak another language. Let the laws for the protection of personal freedom be the same for the alien as for the citizen; but let the laws regulating political rights restrict their exercise to the citizen.

Sir, I am not to be thus driven into a violation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution of the country. Under it the rights of the States are as sacred as those of the nation; its express provision is that—

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

In strange conflict with this is the proposition of this bill, that if the State organized and admitted under it exercise the essential powers of local State government thus reserved to the people, contrary to the provisions of this act, the State shall lose its right to be represented in Congress.

The equality of the States and the equality of men in the rights of person before the law is what the Constitution enjoins and the people demand.

Sir, this bill not only assumes to fetter the power of the State, but it assumes in like manner to fetter the power of the nation, by declaring as it does that—

If the provisions of this section should ever be altered, repealed, expunged, or in any way abrogated, this act shall become void and said State lose its right to be represented in Congress.

Suppose a future Congress should repeal it, would it not be repealed? Suppose it should alter or abrogate it, would it not be altered or abrogated? Is a State to be denied representation because Congress exercises the power that rightfully belongs to it to repeal the legislation of a prior Congress? I think instead of being a bill of reconstruction it is a bill of destruction; instead of being a bill of restoration it is a bill of disunion and perpetual dismemberment; instead of a bill to restore the disorganized States as equal States of the Union it is a bill to convert them into vassal provinces.

And as for the bill introduced by my colleague, I beg leave to say, with all respect for the chairman of the Committee on Territories, [Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio,] that it needs a great deal of consideration before it can be passed upon safely by this House or accepted as a rule for its action. I do not intend to delay the House with any extended remarks about it further than to say this: that it recognizes in its provisions that those disorganized communities are States of the Union for Federal purposes, as they undoubtedly are, and will continue to be until Congress in the exercise of that general power to which I have referred chooses to degrade them to the condition of Territories, to partition them or to dismember them, which I hope Congress will not be in haste to do. Until Congress exercises that power and so legislates, the insurgent States remain States for Federal purposes. Congress from the beginning of the war to this hour has always so recognized them. It so recognized them in 1861, in the first year of the war, when it apportioned direct taxes among them as States and upon the basis of their representative population.

The Congress recognized the insurgent States as States of the Union for Federal purposes in 1862 when it apportioned representation among every one of them as States of the Union, which bill stands unrepealed at this hour. The Congress recognized them when it made an appropriation to pay the salaries of the United States district judges in the States of Florida, Mississippi, and Alabama. There is no escape from the conclusion. I recognize our authority to reduce those States to Territories; but you have not so reduced them, neither is it made to appear that it is necessary so to partition and dismember them.

By my colleague's bill those States are legislated over both as States and Territories. The Federal courts are there; and by one section of this bill men are held to answer in the district courts of the United States in the several insurgent States, and under another provision of the bill conventions, composed of delegates authorized to be chosen for the purpose of organizing constitutional State governments, are authorized to appoint judges for county and district courts in all those great States, to which courts so created are to be committed the issues of life and death. I want to know by what authority the Congress of the United States can invest a convention of delegates with power to authorize courts that are to sit in judgment upon the lives, liberties, and property of the citizens of the United States anywhere within the States of this Union? A gentleman inquires what right the President has to do it. No more right than the Czar of Russia; but that does not excuse the Congress of the United States for undertaking any such acts of usurpation. The judicial power of the United States can only be exercised in the States. Who ever heard of a district court of the United States in any Territory of this Union? You hear of territorial courts, but there is no district court of the United States in Nebraska, nor in Utah, nor in Washington, nor in Dakota; but there is a district court of the United States in session to-day in the States of Alabama and Mississippi and two of them in Florida, as there are in New-York and Massachusetts. Notwithstanding the fact that the courts of the United States are established and open in the late insurrectionary States, this bill provides for the organization of courts with general jurisdiction over the lives, liberties, and property of men, and the judges of those courts to be appointed by a convention and controlled by a committee of public safety.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I ask unanimous consent of the House that the time of my colleague be extended fifteen minutes.

No objection was made, and Mr. BINGHAM's time was extended accordingly.

Mr. BINGHAM. I have but a few more words to say. I shall not trespass much longer upon the time of the House. The question I have been discussing is, sir, a grave and delicate question. It is because the bills concern the nation's peace and the reorganization and restoration of States that I ask that the bills be referred to the committee appointed for the very purpose of considering the reconstruction of those States. Let the bills be so referred and see if that committee will depart to the extent proposed from that measure as a basis of reconstruction which the people themselves are now considering.

I cannot, Mr. Speaker, for the reasons which I have stated, pronounce the bill presented by my colleague [Mr. ASHLEY] anything else than a bill of anarchy. It sweeps away all the laws in those States; it declares the laws and all acts done under them void, and subjects the people thereof to such laws as may hereafter be enacted. In the mean time, until that hereafter comes, by what laws are the twelve million citizens therein to be governed? Why, sir, a people without law, either to restrain the lawless or to shelter the just, are as a people without hope and without God in the world; most miserable. I repeat it, therefore, the bill is a bill of anarchy, and not a bill of restoration. I look upon it as a bill to place hinderances in the way of restoration, and therefore I ask that it may be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction. I look upon both these bills as a manifest departure from the spirit and intent of our constitutional amendment. I look upon it as an attempt to take away from the people of the States lately in rebellion that protection which you have attempted to secure to them by your constitutional amendment. I do not say that all of those people are entitled to mercy or consideration at the hands of the American people and of their representatives in Congress assembled, yet I do say that there is something grander in magnanimity and mercy than there is in stern, relentless, even-handed justice. A great people's power shows likest God's when mercy seasons justice. Vengeance is not duty, nor forgiveness crime. The amendment before the loyal people and about to be approved I trust by them and made part of the Constitution, secures to all, even to those who organized conspiracy against the nation's life and offended by their crimes as men never offended before since nations began to be, "the equal protection of the laws." In what is soon to be the nation's measure for restoration and unity there is neither confiscation nor banishment into returnless exile, but forgiveness, by which that great body of guilty criminals are restored to the privileges of citizenship and guaranteed the equal protection of the laws. I know those conspirators have ridged your land all over with graves; I know that four hundred thousand of the bravest and noblest of the Republic have fallen by traitor hands, martyrs in defense of your country and mine, of your Constitution and mine. In the presence of this great crime and the wrongs thus inflicted, this proposed act of general forgiveness and amnesty, securing to each, however guilty, the equal protection of the laws by the combined power of the nation, is a sublime humanity which challenges a parallel since man was upon the earth. There stands the covenant: no State in this land shall deny to any person the equal protection of the laws. It was a needful provision. It is intended to hush the cry for blood against the guilty by the power of a sovereign decree, as that was done by the Supreme Power in the case of the first murderer. All the guilty with the innocent, the just and the unjust alike, "shall all have the equal protection of the laws," and be held to answer only to the laws, and be condemned only by the laws. Stand by that great amendment for equal rights and equal protection. There is strength in it; the strength that abides in an inviolable justice. There is peace in it; that peace which comes of laws which are just to all and oppressive of none.

The gentleman would stay the people in their wise purpose by enacting a law to take from a million men the immunities and privileges of citizens. Let the question be decided by the people. Whatever that decision may be I will bow to it; if they accept the amendment I will stand by it; if they reject it I will then do whatever it seems to me my duty, under the powers committed to me as a Representative of the people, authorizes and requires me to do. But until that question is passed upon I protest against this proposed legislation, so utterly foreign to the spirit of the pending constitutional amendment and to the manifest will of the nation.

Mr. STEVENS. I would ask the gentleman how many of these States have already rejected the amendment?

Mr. BINGHAM. I had closed what I had to say; but as the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has asked the question, I can only answer him that as far as I am advised all of the States lately in rebellion which have considered it in their Legislatures, with the exception perhaps of Arkansas, have rejected it.

Mr. STEVENS. Arkansas has rejected it. Mr. BINGHAM. I do not so understand it, but I am not going to dispute with the gentleman. If they have all rejected it it does not follow that they will not all yet accept it.

Mr. STEVENS. The most votes they got for it were four.

Mr. BINGHAM. I will repeat what I have said already: that if three fourths of the organized and represented States put this amendment into the Constitution of the United States, it will bind the insurgent States and give them the benefits of it as well, whenever in good faith those States choose to accept it, while, in the mean time, it will also bind us and empower us by law to secure full and equal protection to all. For that reason I ask that the bills be referred to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. DAWSON resumed the floor.

Mr. MILLER. Will my colleague [Mr. DAWSON] yield to me for a moment?

Mr. DAWSON. For a moment; yes, sir.

Mr. MILLER. I move to amend the ninth section of the substitute of my colleague [Mr. STEVENS] by adding to it the following:

And such State ratify the amendment to the Constitution of the United States proposed by two thirds of both Houses of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, and submitted to the respective States for ratification.

I hope the gentleman will not object to that.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot agree to that.

The SPEAKER. It is not in order to amend either one of the substitutes now pending, as the power of amendment in that respect is exhausted. And the original bill cannot be perfected by amendment, because the motion to refer is now pending, which cuts off all amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. As this bill is already out of print, I ask unanimous consent to have it ordered to be printed between now and tomorrow morning.

No objection was made, and the order to print was made accordingly.

Mr. DAWSON again resumed the floor, and addressed the House as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I have watched the proceedings of this body with deep interest. No one has been a more attentive listener or more carefully reflected upon the subjects which have engaged its attention. Feeling as I have done from the first the magnitude and imminence of the danger which rested and continues to rest upon the future of the country, and oppressed as I still am with anxiety for her fate, it is but an obvious suggestion of duty to contribute whatever of ability and influence I may possess toward a solution of the difficulties which yet, with much obstinacy, obstruct a return of this great land to the quiet, the harmony, and progressive prosperity which only a decade ago rendered her the pride and envy of the civilized world.

The war from which we have emerged was waged for the restoration of the Union. It has been successful in the suppression of the rebellion, but the result has not been the restoration of the Union. There is conquest, but there is no Union. I desire, sir, to inquire in all sincerity why this lamentable duality of conditions still obtains in reference to a great people, which nature and the wisdom of revered legislators intended to be one. My wish and purpose are to do this in a spirit wholly apart from and above that of the partisan. It must be the impulse of every heart not unworthy a citizen of America to let party and platform sink together in the dust in the presence of great questions affecting vitally the safety of his country. I shall exercise the privilege, which I have always done upon this floor, of criticising with freedom and decision where I feel compelled to dissent, and with equal boldness shall indicate what I think is to be done in the trying exigency of our political and social relations to bring back that internal harmony without which durable peace and union are but fond aspirations or deceitful illusions.

The course of duty is not, I apprehend, so difficult to discover if we do not willfully shut our eyes to the principles and facts which heretofore all have acknowledged as fundamental and governing; and if we do not elevate and magnify into primary importance those which in their nature are secondary and of comparative insignificance. We have emerged from a great civil war; the greatest, indeed, of any age, and we have in consequence a somewhat anomalous state of facts to deal with.

The Federal Union, which was the common Government of all the States and their respective populations, was disturbed by an attempt at disruption by a portion of the parties to it. The project of secession failed; but the relations which the seceding States since the war sustain to those adhering to the Union have been the subject of very conflicting theories. On the one hand, it is maintained that by the act of rebellion the States which engaged in it have forfeited all their rights, State and individual; they are without any valid governments save such as the legislative branch of the Government may choose to extend to them, and they exist only by the mercy of the conquerors. This is the theory of the Republican party, and has given rise to the measures upon this subject of the last and present Congress. On the other hand, it is claimed that the attempt at secession having been suppressed by the physical power of the Government, the States, whose authority was usurped by the parties to the movement, have never at any time been out of the Union; and that having once expressed their acquiescence in the result of the contest and renewed their allegiance to the Union they are at the same time restored to all the rights and duties of the adhering States. This is the doctrine which is held by the Executive, and has given shape to the presidential policy.

Recognizing, as I do, in the presidential theory the true solution of our difficulties, I will state briefly the reasons which move me to this conclusion. It is a fact that the close of the Revolution found the people of these States in the condition of distinct sovereignties. The Articles of Confederation were but a league of these. The Constitution of 1789 differed from the old in this: that it invested the common Government with certain attributes of sovereignty which had before belonged exclusively to the States in their separate capacities. As to these powers, distinctly specified in the common charter, allegiance was due to the Federal Government. As to all other powers not specified, sovereignty was still reserved to the States. The Federal Government was as supreme as to the granted powers as the States were as to the reserved, both governments proceeding directly from the people—the true source of power in a democratic government. The General Government was Federal, (as its name implies,) inasmuch as it was formed by the accession of the several populations as separate and independent States; but it was not Federal in the sense of a league, as the Government of the old Confederation had been. That was formed by the States in their corporate capacities, and affected the States only as corporations. The new Government was created by the act of the people as individuals, ratifying by their representatives in conventions; and its powers were to be exercised directly upon individuals. The new government was "national" within the range of its powers, since it was the union of the sovereign powers of the States for the specified objects. State sovereignty no longer existed; but State rights—the exercise of the portion of sovereignty reserved—remained in full force. The difference between the two constitutions was, that by the one the States retained their full sovereignty; by the other they did not.

In cases of Federal or State encroachment the constituted arbiter was the Supreme Court; and whenever popular passion should become too strong to wait for its decrees or regard them when promulgated the contest would necessarily become one of physical force. If, in the opinion of the populations of the States, the right of local self-government were not duly protected or were infringed upon by the common Government of limited powers, duty to the local governments might counsel resistance, and if the Federal authority were equally tenacious it is obvious that an issue would be raised which could only be decided by an appeal to arms. Now, this is precisely what has happened in our recent history. The southern populations, apprehending that by the election of Mr. Lincoln upon a platform which they regarded as aggressive to their local rights, and which purposed the exclusion of southern communities from the equal benefits contemplated by the common Government, felt called upon to assume their own protection by a new confederacy. This necessarily brought on with the common Government, already established, which yet disclaimed any intention of exceeding its defined powers, and which felt impelled to every effort for self-preservation, since it was a Government deliberately adopted by all the people, whose consent was not to be withdrawn upon the mere apprehension of injury—this brought on, I say, with the common Government an issue of force. How this has been decided; with what a prodigious exhibition of energy by the respective parties; with what prodigal waste of blood and of life, what darkened homes, what an accumulation of the burdens of the people, what disruption of kindred ties, and what engendered bitterness; we are all, alas! but too painfully familiar. I have more than once, from my place here, as well as elsewhere, declared my conviction that the South grievously erred in its choice of a remedy for the evils of which it complained. I of course acknowledge the right of revolution for adequate cause, but that cause I was unable to find in the facts immediately antecedent to the rebellion. The doctrines and policy of the Republican party I did think aggressive upon southern rights, but I regarded them but as brutum fulmen, while the South held an all-sufficient curb in a constitutional majority in both Houses of Congress and in the shield of the Constitution always resting over them.

I do not overlook the fact that, contemporaneously with the origin of the Government, there were great differences of opinion among wise and good statesmen as to the relative extent, and in certain contingencies the relative supremacy, of the State and Federal Governments. These differences obtained extensively without reference to section. The Virginia and Kentucky resolutions of 1798 gave prominence to State rights, though doubtless not intended by their authors to authorize and not legitimately authorizing the conclusions which a peculiar school of politicians subsequently drew from them. Those resolutions were believed to announce the true theory of State relations, and as such became fundamental points of Democratic faith as maintained by Jefferson and Madison, and have been constantly upheld since by that party which has shaped the policy of the Government for three fourths of its existence. The practical application of those doctrines to authorize secession was, indeed, first made in New England during the late war with Great Britain. The purpose of seceding was seriously agitated in her State Legislatures, and in all probability would have resulted in open rebellion but for the timely treaty which terminated the war. Secession, the illegitimate offspring of sound principles, was thus for the time baffled in her mistaken aspirations. She was, however, again evoked from her obscurity, a fresh competitor for public favor, by the nullification politicians of South Carolina. A wise policy of compromise on the part of the Government at that time averted a crisis. Increased plausibility was subsequently given to her pretensions by the genius of Calhoun and other leading statesmen of the South; and unquestionably they had become so extensively received as to lend much support to the recent rebellion. I believe, however, that the claims of this spurious issue of Democratic doctrine have always been rejected, North and South, by the soundest and wisest of our political teachers.

Thirty-seven years ago, in 1830, the Senate became the theater of a memorable contest as to the true construction of the Constitution upon the relative powers of the Federal and State Governments. It was memorable from the character of the contestants—Webster, of vast intellect and resources, without a superior in powers of debate; and Hayne, who lacked no element of skill, ingenuity, or spirit, for the maintenance of a peculiar theory. Webster was the advocate of consolidation because he supported the protective interest, and that theory was deemed necessary to procure its establishment. Hayne was, on the contrary, the champion of a free market, in which the products of his own locality would find a return of their full value. Thus this debate was an exhibition of the best efforts of their greatest advocates in defense of their sectional interests. But a surpassing interest attaches to the contest from the subject of dispute. This was of the utmost practical importance, the great New Englander maintaining that the Federal Constitution is a government formed by the people of the United States in their aggregate capacity, as one mass; and that the only remedies for a State resisting Federal legislation as unconstitutional are those pointed out by the instrument itself, the decision of the Supreme Court, an amendment of the Constitution itself, or lastly, in cases not provided for by the instrument, the remedy of revolution. And the eminent Carolinian defending the opposite thesis, that the Constitution is a compact to which the States in their sovereign capacities are the parties; and that in virtue of the still subsisting State sovereignty, a State may nullify a law deemed by her unconstitutional, and thus check Federal action within her territory until Congress shall have obtained the necessary power by an amendment of the compact by three fourths of the States.

It will be remembered that the Democratic administration of General Jackson was then in power, and how the threat of the State of South Carolina to carry into act the doctrines supported by Mr. Hayne was met by the Executive, speaking by the voice and pen of Edward Livingston, his Secretary of State. That learned and able jurist and patriotic statesman, in his speech in the Senate on Mr. Foot's resolutions, and afterward in President Jackson's proclamation in 1833, drew the line of distinction between the Federal and State authority in a manner which, till the recent outbreak, had commanded the general approbation of the country. In those great efforts, the force of whose logic has never been broken, it was demonstrated that the sovereignty of the people was divided; one portion of it being vested in the General Government for the purposes specified in the instrument of compact, the other retained for local self-government. No State possessed under the Constitution the right of nullifying by veto or withdrawal the action of the General Government; and this, whether the Constitution were the result of the action of the people as one body, or as separate communities. Mr. Livingston, however, rejected the doctrine of Webster, that the people of the United States had in their aggregate capacity established the General Government; for, to use his own language—

"It would lead to the most disastrous results; it would place three fourths of the States at the mercy of one fourth, and lead inevitably to a consolidated Government, and finally to monarchy, if the doctrine were generally admitted; and if partially so and opposed, to civil dissensions."

He argued that if both governments were created by the people as one people it would matter little in the estimation of those who received the doctrine whether any particular power was exerted by the Federal Government or the State. Upon various pleas it would be imagined for the benefit of the people that the General Government should exercise this power or that until the whole aggregate of the reserved powers should be taken possession of by the General Government and absorbed. It would be but a step from this to centralizing it in a single man. I refer to this debate to show that the positions I have assumed were those recognized, not by the Democratic party in the person of President Jackson, but generally by men of all parties at the time.

The Jackson proclamation fixed the true interpretation of the Constitution; and, as thus interpreted, it subsists to us at this day after the country has passed the greatest struggle of which history bears record. The cardinal points of the Jackson construction I regard as of the highest importance for the welfare of this people, and I think should be held up for public recognition upon every fitting occasion. They fix in perpetuity upon the chart of our national policy the position of those dangerous rocks, the Scylla of consolidation on the one hand, and on the other the Charybdis of secession—between which alone are found free and safe soundings. But, whether deriving its origin from erroneous theory or from the just right of revolution misapplied, the result of the late contest has been adverse to those who rested it upon either. The rebellion has been suppressed; the oneness of the United States as a nation, and the extension of its Government over all the territory which formerly acknowledged its authority, have been effectually maintained.

It was upon the theory of this continued oneness that the war for the suppression of the rebellion was initiated and conducted to a successful issue. If secession was an accomplished fact, establishing the independence of the seceding States, then where was any legitimate cause of war, as arising from the act of secession? Obviously there was none. On the principles of the Declaration of Independence every nation has the right, unobstructed by any other, "to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" in its own way; and the South should therefore have been permitted to "depart in peace." But the subsistence of the Union having been successfully asserted, how is it that the seceding States can be said, in any sense, to be out of the Union? Surely they cannot be so by reason, of an ineffectual attempted revolution. That they are not out of the Union is the great fact which the issue of the contest has decided. The southern States are, therefore, still integral parts of the Union, with the same rights as States, no more, no less, as they had before the rebellion.

It must be admitted, indeed, that whatever was put in issue in this contest has been decided adversely to the unsuccessful party. The issue at the outset was the existence or non-existence of the Union. As the war progressed the institution of slavery was also made an issue as a war measure as one of the means allowed, it was maintained by the laws of war, to harass an enemy. When the rebel power was broken and their armies surrendered, they accepted the result; they abandoned the scheme of independence, separate and confederate; they consented to the extinction of slavery. They have done more. The States have resumed, as far as in them lies, their normal relations to the Federal Government by renewing their allegiance and electing Representatives to the national Legislature.

Now, while such is the condition of things as regards the rebel States, what is the course of the Government toward them? I shall speak first of the course pursued by Congress, and afterward of that adopted by the President, for unhappily the two are in conflict.

The course of Congress in regard to the rebel States is based upon the assumption that a reconstruction of the Government as to those States is what they are called upon to achieve. This assumes again that the old Government, the Constitution of 1789, has as to those States been destroyed. But if so, wherein or how? Not surely by the decisive success of the Union arms in establishing the existence and supremacy of the Federal charter; not by the surrender of the rebel armies—their implied abandonment of the issues for which they resorted to force, and their prompt return to obedience to the paramount law. The Government was not broken up by an attempted withdrawal and a claim to a State sovereignty and independence, which on an appeal to the sword the seceding States failed to establish. The congressional idea of reconstruction, therefore, proceeds upon an assumption not sustained by fact.

As growing out of this assumption, however, and consequent upon it, resort is had to another doctrine, that of an assumed forfeiture by the rebel States of their rights in the Union, which is held an all-sufficient justification of the policy proposed. To any unsophisticated apprehension I need hardly urge that the application of any such doctrine is as utterly without constitutional warrant and as baseless as the idea of a dissolution of the Government for some purposes and not for all. Forfeiture as to States is not a constitutional penalty, and in a Government of defined powers like ours has no place. Forfeiture may be pretended and enforced where one of the contending parties is the superior of the other; but in our Government the members are all equal. It may consistently be applied by a monarch to a rebellious portion of his subjects; it may have place between independent powers in favor of the victor. It is unregulated by law, and is whatever the conqueror chooses to make it. It is the reckless assertion of the right of the strongest.

The Constitution does indeed provide for its alteration by submitting propositions for this purpose to the States, which shall be valid as amendments when ratified by three fourths of their number. But this means their voluntary ratification by three fourths of all the States, and not the exclusion of ten States from the enjoyment of their constitutional rights as such until, with their own consent or without, they shall have submitted to this forced ratification as a condition-precedent.

The imposition by the adhering States of conditions upon the seceding, while it implies a superiority in the former and is opposed to our system of government, is at the same time in gross and flagrant violation of the principles on which the war was professed to be waged. Attention has been too often called to those principles in this body and elsewhere for us to forget that the proclamation of President Lincoln at the beginning of the war demanded only the cessation of the rebellion; and that Congress, directly after the first battle of Bull Run, made by joint resolution that memorable declaration contained in the Crittenden resolution.

This purpose, thus distinctly announced at the beginning, was frequently repeated during its progress, both by the President and Congress and by our generals in the field. It was further declared in the Republican platform of 1864, and the unity of the nation was also recognized by the passage of the bill apportioning Representatives in 1862. Now, with this record, how shall we acquit ourselves to the Army and Navy, to the world, and to our posterity, of the charge of deliberate unfairness, if we now, at the close of the war, assume it to have been waged for the purpose of spoliation and oppression? Would those gallant soldiers who gave victory to our arms have flocked to your standard with such alacrity of patriotic devotion, such recklessness of personal sacrifice and suffering, had you frankly told them at the outset that they were to fight for so unhalloved an object as this? I will not wrong them so much as for an instant to suppose them capable of such complicity in the national dishonor.

The cessation of resistance to the execution of the Federal laws and the abolition of slavery being the only terms, at any time during the war, required to be complied with by the rebels in order to their restoration to the Union, on the return of peace should we vary these terms? Is it consistent with our honor to set up new and exacting conditions after we have gotten the rebels in our power? Sir, I will yet trust the intelligence and virtue of this people to save the nation from such a humiliating situation as this.

I wish to look a moment at the principal of those conditions upon which Congress insists. They have passed over the President's veto certain laws and propositions of amendment to the Constitution, the terms of which they require to be complied with before the States of the South shall be again received into fellowship.

By the Freedmen's Bureau bill that institution was made a permanent establishment, with a field for its operations coextensive with the existence of freedmen. It would thus be as operative in Pennsylvania as in Virginia. The powers vested in this new tribunal are such as may well excite our most earnest solicitude. In all cases affecting a negro "military jurisdiction and protection" are required to be extended to him. This in criminal cases sets martial law and the officers of the bureau above the laws and officers of the States, and is a violation of the constitutional guarantees of security from arrest without warrant and of jury trial.

The system which is thus attempted to be legalized imposes an enormous addition to the burdens of the people, while the report of the commissioners appointed to examine into the condition of the freedmen shows the terrible abuses of which the bureau is the instrument, even toward those whom it proposed especially to benefit. While thus unjust to white and black race alike, it is founded upon a false principle, that of placing in the condition of dependents upon the Government four millions of thriftless population.

The first section of the amendment proposes to make citizens of all persons, regardless of race or color, born or naturalized, in this country; and it proposes penalties upon all who in any way attempt to abridge the privileges and immunities of citizens. How many and what are the privileges essentially belonging to citizens is a thing very undefined. If Congress has the right to declare who shall be citizens, it has the right at the same time to declare what shall be their privileges. The Constitution framed by our fathers left this matter with the States, only declaring that those qualified under the State laws to vote for the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures should be qualified to elect representatives to Congress. But Congress, now usurping the power from the States, while it makes citizens of whom it pleases, may also define their privileges. Thus under this amendment the elective franchise may at any time be declared one of those privileges when negro suffrage becomes unalterably fastened upon the country.

In framing our Federal system the States reserved to themselves the control of this matter of suffrage, as essential to the preservation of their freedom. In the exercise of the mass of powers retained by the States for their local government it was essential that they should determine who should be qualified participants; for if this could be done by any power outside of the States, their self-government, and consequently their freedom, would be no longer secure. That "republican form of government" guaranteed to the States by the Constitution would become an impracticable thing.

Self-government is the essence of republicanism, and to this effect was the language of Mr. Madison in the Convention. So long as a State can determine who or what classes of its citizens shall have a voice in the selection of the State officers—of those who shall make and administer the laws—just so long its government is republican. But if this power be taken from it and lodged elsewhere, the republican character, and therefore the liberties of the States, have received a fatal blow. The annihilation of the State governments is by this privation effectually consummated. The local governments are thenceforward not even republican in "form," and in this matter not to be republican in form is not to be so in substance. By thus forcing upon the southern States negro suffrage, it is proposed to raise the negro to an equality with the southern whites, who belong to that race which has thus far in all that elevates and dignifies humanity—in arts and arms and institutions of government—proved itself the foremost in this world. The incapacity of man for self-government has often been commented upon by the philosophic historian; and the republics of Greece and Rome, of modern Italy, and of attempts in that direction in England and France, have been pointed to as melancholy proofs of the fact. It has hitherto been supposed, even among ourselves, that free institutions could only live while supported by the intelligence and virtue of the people; but in the reckless rapidity of our republican progress we seem to have discovered that a democracy may well subsist where the people who composes it have neither of those principles to rest upon. It must not be forgotten that the whole number of votes of the States which it is meant to punish in this way is only fifty-three, while that of the other States is one hundred and ninety-two. The disparity alone should disarm fear and moderate exaction.

The Constitution, in section five of article first, provides that "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members;" that is, whether they have been properly elected, and whether there is any constitutional or legal objection to them personally; this power only applies to the individual Representatives, which is a very different thing from Congress excluding whole States from representation upon condition of adopting a constitutional amendment which changes the basis of representation. There is no warrant in the Constitution for such an exercise of tyranny. Had such a condition been insisted upon at the adoption of the Constitution, it must be admitted there would have been no Government. But if it could be supposed that the excluded States would accept the amendment, how dangerous is the principle which underlies it! If a party majority now can change the Constitution by forced amendments, what is to prevent another majority at a future day from changing it again? If a majority can now in this way force universal suffrage upon ten States in the absence of representation, why should not a majority hereafter require an equalization of State representation in the Senate and exclude New England, taxing her in the mean time until she shall give her consent?

New England, under the application of her own rule, might thus find herself suddenly stripped of five sixths of her representation in the higher branch of the national Legislature. While there is much in the New England character which no intelligent mind can fail to admire—while all bear willing tribute to her energy and thrift, to her indomitable will, her learning and large culture—yet there are few outside of her limits who do not feel compelled to abate largely their estimations of these qualities from their proneness to misdirection and disturbance of the public peace. Her characteristic activity of mind acknowledges nothing as settled, whether in religion, in science, in politics, or law, and exposes her in a special degree to these storms of fanaticism and party zeal which are apt to carry infinite mischief in their train. We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that, having heretofore profited so largely by shaping the legislation of the country to her own advantage, she is now, with concentrated energy, struggling to maintain that advantage even at the sacrifice of the union of the States. She dreads a full representation of the great agricultural South, acting in conjunction with the great agricultural Northwest and the commercial interests of New York and the States of the Pacific coast. These sections, representing in the main a community of interest, it is not only feared, but known, can give the law to the country; and thus will follow a readjustment of our internal revenue and the policy of our foreign commerce.

The conditions proposed by Congress, exhibiting such strong indications of their purpose and origin, such shameless outrage upon justice and every conservative principle, such usurpation of Federal powers, and such violation of State rights, could not be expected to be received without question, even by the Republican majority, if submitted in the regular way to the deliberation of each House separately. It was necessary to resort to revolutionary France for an instrument for the production of the monstrous scheme. In the "committee of safety" of the constituent assembly they were presented with a precedent for that of "reconstruction." Their designs not being of a nature to endure the open light of day, had to be matured in the mysterious secrecy of an extraordinary committee. Refractory members were to be crushed, and all who in any way opposed themselves to the purposes of the committee were to be relentlessly sacrificed. It cannot be denied that, if alien to our institutions, the machinery was at least admirably adapted to securing the unity and strength requisite for the success of such a policy of destruction.

So perfectly, indeed, is the policy of Congress adapted to break up the Union—to prevent the return of the country in all its parts under one government—that it is hard to avoid believing this to have been the object of it. The authors of this policy know well, by consulting their own breasts, that their southern brethren will never consent to accept such terms as these. They know it is requiring what they would themselves never consent to in like circumstances. While it is irreconcilable with the hypothesis of a still subsisting Union, and in violation of the rights guaranteed by the Constitution, which is its bond, to every State, it is admissible only on the supposition that the war was waged for subjugation, which yet Congress and the Executive during its progress most carefully disclaimed. It assumes that subjugation has been in fact effected, and that, with the insolent triumph of conquerors, we are now at perfect liberty to trample upon and oppress a fallen foe. Feeling that they have no support for their course in the Federal compact, in common justice or reason, some of the leaders of this policy do not hesitate to avow their hatred of the Union and their determination that it shall never be restored. In this point of view their course is intelligible and consistent. But in assuming this ground they place themselves as much in the attitude of rebellion as the most arrant rebels whom they seek to humble. Others seek to justify their vindictive policy by resting its defense upon the rights of successful belligerents under the law of nations. It is true that, after much delay and great reluctance, the de facto secession was acknowledged, and belligerent rights and their consequences were conceded to the rebels. But this was only from the necessity of the case, and in so far as the public law was applicable to our situation. We had to maintain at the same time the integrity of the national Government, so that the belligerent rights conceded had relation only to the conduct of the war. It was, in our case, but lex sub superiori lege; and at the termination of the war the Constitution, the municipal law in all its vigor, resumed its sway, and the States, on again placing themselves in the constitutional relation to the Federal Government, were in the same instant reinstated in the rights reserved to them and their people by the common charter.

Under the municipal law the penalty was to be meted out, not to States, but to individuals. The extent of punishment thus to be inflicted was a matter for the consideration of courts and for the executioner of the law. It is idle, sir, to talk of punishing the rebels for their treason. The spirit of the age is against it. This vindictive spirit and purpose which characterizes the congressional measures has about it too much of that uncompromising intolerance of Cato the Censor, who, it will be remembered, concluded every speech which he made in the Senate—no matter how irrelevant the subject—with the savage declaration, "Carthage must be destroyed." As between foreign and rival States, and in a heathen age of the world, such an inexorable sentiment might receive some degree of toleration; but in a Christian age and country, and between different portions of the same people, between countrymen and brethren, surely the ill-disguised design expressed here for the total annihilation of the South can be received only with abhorrence.

It is agreed by writers on public law that where great masses of people, actuated by a common impulse which they believe to be right, however erroneously, proceed to use force for the assertion of their principles, that these masses are not guilty of treason, morally or legally. No one is guilty of treason for obeying the Government de facto. The existence of a common sentiment so extensive, of a resistance so unanimous, supposes a cause. If the cause were just and good, its success relieved it of the character of treason; and whether good or bad its failure was a sufficient penalty. Without a recognition of the laws of war to govern the contest, our civil war on both sides would have been one of extermination. No prisoners would have been taken, no exchanges made. But the law of nations, the slow growth of civilization, interposes between belligerents, whether independent Powers or divided portions of the same Power, in favor of humanity, and to prevent the barbarous and useless effusion of blood. These laws have been constantly ameliorated under the progressive spirit of Christianity; and we find Montesquieu advocating their especial applicability in a republic, and writers like Hallam and Macaulay maintaining that these laws should have strictly governed in the war of the great rebellion in England. Charles the First, says Macaulay, should not have been executed; and as little would he have been justified, in case of his success, in putting his adversaries to death. In the suppression of the Irish rebellion in 1848 by England we have an example of a wise clemency, aiming to heal the deep-seated discontents of a people, rather than standing upon the strict ground of legal right, to keep alive the fires of irritation by the exercise of a cruel and vindictive policy.

Far different from the revolutionary, unjust, vindictive, and unwise policy with which the Congress would deal with the rebel States is that which our firm and enlightened Executive has inaugurated. Peace having been restored by the submission of the rebels and such action in the seceding States as recognized the authority of the paramount law, his patriotic glance at once apprehended the situation and the line of duty. The President no longer of a divided but a united country, he saw that it was not for him to "give up to party what was meant for mankind," but that the position called him to merge the partisan in the Chief Magistrate and the statesman. He might naturally desire to carry with him in his views the legislative coördinate department of the Government; but if they differed his duty was not the less clear. He was to obey the oath, which he had sworn, to maintain the Constitution of his country. He must be true to his bright record of consistent patriotism, exhibited throughout a long life passed in the service of the Government and in every official grade. He had private griefs enough to incline him to the measures of the most extreme radical. For the love of his country and her institutions he retained his position in the Senate when every other Senator of his section had withdrawn. He endured with stoical firmness the ruin of his private fortune and the unwearied persecution of open and secret foes.

Members of his own household had fallen upon the battle-field in defense of the cause which he had most at heart. Yet he swerved not. It was not that he hated secession less, but that he loved his country more. The moral grandeur which he has exhibited in such circumstances of peculiar trial is such as has been shown by few in the whole extent of history. "The just man, tenacious of his purpose," so handsomely eulogized by the Roman poet, the storm of partisan fury may beat upon him in vain. He may break beneath it, but he will never bend. Whether successful or unsuccessful in his object of giving once more peace and happiness to a distracted land, his merit is the same. He has met his own responsibilities with a clear perception, a determined will, and an unflinching breast. On the suppression by Cicero of the conspiracy of Cataline, it will be remembered that at the suggestion of Cato he was honored by the people with the title of the "father of his country." With signal propriety this title was bestowed upon that great and good man whose military success gave us existence as a nation. I submit, sir, that it belongs equally to him who saves his country from destruction.

Filled with a just apprehension of his position, its importance and duties, whatever obstacles may oppose their performance, the President, like Gustavus Vasa and William of Orange in like circumstances, I trust will "stem the current and march through the thick array." His fidelity and success in the past is an assurance of a glorious triumph in the future. But if in the night of our distress it should prove true that "republics are ungrateful," (since Cicero was banished after his deliverance of Rome from the grasp of Cataline, and Aristides driven from Greece because his exalted worth brought down upon him the vengeance of rivals and desperate men,) the historian must yet record that this man, whose whole life has been devoted to the elevation of the masses and the maintenance of the cause of industrial occupation, was chiefly instrumental in placing upon the statute-book an act of great public beneficence. Already under its practical workings one hundred thousand homes have been secured and settled on the public domain, and in the not far distant future the number will rise to a million homesteads, the smoke of whose cabins on the Mississippi, the Missouri, the Yellowstone, the Columbia, and the Arkansas, rising from firesides made happy by this kindly provision, will be so many enduring monuments to his memory and to his fame.

When the forces of the resisting States laid down their arms he recognized all their reserved rights and their equal rights in the federation. It was contended that the President, in this action toward the southern States, had exceeded the executive functions; that he had exercised power which belonged exclusively to the Legislature. He had, however, without incurring censure on that account, under laws already established, restored the mails and reopened the channels of commerce, and reestablished the courts. It was particularly objected that the President had no power "to make peace." But if the executive has not, what branch of the Government has? It is clear that the power is not vested in Congress; for a proposition offered in the Convention which framed the Constitution for "a concurrence of two thirds of the Senate to make treaties of peace without the concurrence of the President" was voted down by a vote of eight States to three. (See Madison Papers, volume five of Elliott's Debates, pp. 524, 525.) Treaties of peace were therefore left as any other treaties, requiring in all cases the concurrence of the President. Making peace is therefore, under the Constitution, as much a presidential as a legislative function. It is, indeed, much more so, as the act is executive in its nature, and one for which a deliberative body, from its number and lack of unity, is unfit.

But the objection proceeds upon a mistake of the question; for it is not a case of making peace with a foreign Power. It is wholly one of internal administration, in which the municipal law alone governs, and in which the Constitution makes it the duty of the President to see that the laws are faithfully executed. The rebellion having been suppressed, the laws resumed their sway.

Chief among the rights to which the people of the seceding States were entitled upon their return to the Union were those of representation in both bodies of Congress. These were accordingly conceded by the President. An omission to concede them would have involved a plain violation of express provisions of the Constitution and of his official oath. By section four of article four—

"The United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

By section two of article one—

"The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States."

And by section three of the same article—

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State," &c.

Here was authority enough for one who had no ends to serve but those of country. Had he needed more it might have been found in the Farewell Address of the President who was first in the hearts of his countrymen. From that he would have received the lofty teaching that—

"The basis of our political system is the right of the people to make and to alter their constitutions of government; but the Constitution which at any time exists, till changed by an explicit and authentic act of the whole people, is sacredly obligatory upon all."

He might also, in the same rich legacy of patriotism and political wisdom, have read a lesson not less worthy of attention to another department of the Government, which seeks, by consolidation of unauthorized power, to deprive whole States and communities of their guaranteed rights. The lesson is:

"If, in the opinion of the people, the distribution or modification of the constitutional powers be in any particular wrong, let it be corrected by an amendment in the way which the Constitution designates. But let there be no change by usurpation, for though this, in one instance, may be the instrument of good, it is the customary weapon by which free Governments are destroyed. The precedent must always greatly overbalance in permanent evil any partial or transient benefit which the use can at any time yield."

Sir, if there be any principle of democratic government more firmly established than any other in our history it is that of the inseparability of the rights of taxation and representation. We established by the success of our revolution that the home Government had no right to tax us without our consent, or in other words, without being heard by our representatives, and without having through them a voice in deciding the question of taxation. So great and fundamental was this right deemed that our fathers found in it sufficient justification for overturning their Government. It has been recognized as the basis of every Government, State and Federal, which they have framed since. From the reverence with which this right has been regarded in this country, and the immense struggles and sacrifices made here to maintain it, it may properly be called the American principle. Yet how strange is the spectacle we behold! A dominant majority in the Legislature, while admitting the rebel States to be in the Union for the purpose of taxation, yet maintain that they are out of it for the purpose of representation.

You will remember, sir, that the Roman republic granted the full rights of citizenship even to the aliens of conquered provinces, and this regardless of the bitterness and obstinacy of their resistance to the standard of the republic. When once subdued and their defeat acknowledged, they were received into the enjoyment of equal rights with the inhabitants of the city itself. "I am a Roman citizen," was the talismanic formula which secured the inhabitant of distant Sicily protection against the extortions of a Verres as much as it did from any other injury the dweller upon the Seven Hills. And this was done, sir, in a Government which was without a written constitution, from a sense of justice and policy only, and was the great secret why Rome retained her compacted strength while constantly extending her boundaries. Here, on the other hand, in a Government of defined powers, in a polity which is professedly one of self-government, the party which happens at a critical juncture to be possessed of the power denies self-government to the other, though by the common charter the rights of all are equal. It matters not, after peace is restored, that one of these parties has been in rebellion against the common Government, for the status ante bellum instantly revives.

Sir, it is impossible to apply the principles assumed by the majority here in a Government like ours without adopting the theory of the consolidation and centralization of the entire sovereignty of the people in the General Government. I have already occupied the attention of the House upon this subject, yet its importance at this juncture seems to demand some further remark. I fear, sir, that the difference is too little known or considered, the danger too little perceived or heeded; yet no question is of such vital importance. No reader of our history can forget how jealous, at the formation of the Government, were the States of parting with any portion of their sovereignty. This jealousy was natural; for so long as the States retained their full powers every individual possessed, in the authority of his State, the most ample protection for his private rights and for the correction of abuses, while he felt that his interests would receive the most careful attention in the local legislation. He did not feel that his welfare would be quite so well consulted if any of the functions of sovereignty were yielded by the State and deposited in the hands of agents not amenable to State authority, and, it might prove, regardless of individual rights and not sympathizing with individual interests. It was, therefore, only after a long struggle that the States consented to conferring upon a common Government such functions of sovereignty as could be best exercised by it for the general benefit of the whole. While they did so they were equally careful to secure themselves in the possession of the remainder by inserting in the Federal Constitution the provision that—

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."—Article 10, Amendments.

Now, it is of the utmost importance that these boundaries should be preserved; that they should neither be intrenched upon by State action nor by an enlargement of the Federal authority a little beyond what is absolutely required to secure the objects set forth in the preamble to the Constitution. State sovereignty, except in so far as granted away by express stipulation, subsists in its full vigor, and should be guarded with the utmost vigilance. If State rights are absorbed and curtailed in the manner assumed by the amendment which confers upon the General Government the control of the right of suffrage, the individual is placed at a great distance from the guardianship of the sovereign authority, and his State becomes of no more importance in the Government than is a county as respects the government of the State.

The great future which spreads before the country demands for the fulfillment of our mission the preservation of our liberties in the purity in which they were established. The vastness of territory for which coming generations will have to legislate will appear from the consideration of a single fact in our history. It is the facility with which the Government, for reasons deemed expedient at the time, renounced by treaty with Great Britain a very tenable claim to the country lying between 49° and 54° 40', a territory sufficient for the formation of sixteen States as large as Pennsylvania. From the readiness with which so extensive a region, for reasons not imperative, was granted away may be understood the vast extent of that which still remains the property of the nation and is open for the reception of our institutions. America, comprising the States which now are and those yet to be, is the great theater of modern enterprise and political experiment. She must be either republican or despotic. If we yield our theory of State rights and union of limited powers, we surrender the great principle of free government, and may prepare, first for a limited monarchy in the shape of a consolidated government, and eventually for a despotism. Our safety and prosperity as a nation depend entirely upon the inflexible fidelity with which we adhere to and maintain the great boundaries of power, as I have endeavored to point them out. The Union is not a union of force. It cannot be preserved by force. It rests upon interest and the mutual attachment of the members.

When we look, sir, at the unexampled progress of our country in the past, in the limited portion of it brought under settlement, and consider the vast area still open for occupation and development, what powerful inducements do we not see for the preservation of the Union? Our territory, embracing an area of nearly three million square miles, is equal to that of Europe. In natural wealth and in the distribution of the great highways of intercourse afforded by water communication it surpasses any quarter of the globe. In its abundance of the precious metals and minerals, in coal, iron, lead, copper, and petroleum, the material of labor, it is the marvel of the world. Its agricultural capabilities, extending through every variety of climate and production which belong to the temperate zone, are equally unrivaled. It has been calculated that in ten years our product of the cereals will exceed those of England and France together; while a European population greater than that of either of those countries is supported by our cotton. Under the influence of our free institutions the development of our industry has kept pace with our natural advantages. We vie with the oldest and most civilized of existing nations in the products of the useful and ornamental arts, in valuable inventions, and in works of intellect and taste. To united America the world owes the steamboat, the electric telegraph, and the monitor. By the genius of an American the cable binds by electric ties the Eastern and Western hemispheres; and in another lustrum an iron band will connect the great oceans which wash the shores of our continent, and the patriot in the full exultation of his heart may stand upon the golden shores of the Pacific and there witness the new direction which will then be given to the great commercial current of the world.

We have upward of thirty thousand miles of railroad, more than four times as much as England, and more than any other country. The Government has still a thousand million acres of unoccupied land, and our area is capable of supporting a population as great in number. Sir, it is in our power to realize all this, and more than our wildest dreams have pictured. It can be done, but only by preserving in their purity the institutions transmitted us by our fathers and now in our responsible keeping.

A war with foreign Powers sooner or later is inevitable. We have high authority for saying that nation will rise against nation. The struggle for empire, for commercial advantages, for the propagation of systems, religious and political, will forever go on. The evil passions and ambitions of men exist now as in the days of Cataline and the Cæsars. The very attempt to establish on this continent a purely popular Government is so revolutionary and dangerous as an example to the regal Governments across the water that they will sooner or later make a combined effort for its overthrow. This in itself should produce a unity of sentiment in the North for the restoration of fraternal relations.

In such a conflict the South would become a necessity. From the Capes of the Delaware to the Rio Grande are embraced the mouths of the great rivers. The revolution could never have been successful without her hearty coöperation, and without her gallant aid in 1812 we should have lost our country and her independence. We must not only secure to her equality in representation, but equal justice in every department of the administration of the Government. Without this there can be no fraternal relations, and we thus wickedly and blindly cast away that popular affection which is the great basis of our institutions and the bulwark of our defense and security. The English Government is the work of a thousand years, and although great and powerful, and in one sense eminently successful, yet it is maintained by the concentrated power of the House of Lords and by the army and navy. Our Government is still an experiment. Our population is sparse compared with the extent of our territory and the magnitude of our resources. While Belgium has a population of four hundred and thirty-two to the square mile, and England three hundred and seventy-one, the United States have but ten. It requires no reach of vision to see in the not far distant future a change of this condition. From almost every country of Europe streams of emigration are directed to our shores. Our capacity to support a population equal to the most densely inhabited district of England or Germany must be admitted by all. To live and prosper, then, as a great Power in the future, and to avoid a repetition of the bloody and devastating conflict through which we have passed, equal and exact justice in maintaining this republican system are just as necessary as the two well-adjusted forces in maintaining the movements of the planetary world.

In the gloom which pervades the land, and the uncertainty which hangs like a pall over the future of our country, I feel deeply solicitous for the welfare of the State which I have the honor in part to represent. The preservation of the Union is as indispensable to the maintenance of her liberty and her future growth and development, as from her geographical position and the sturdy and virtuous character of her people she is indispensable to the maintenance of the Union itself. For I have no hesitation in saying there is not a district of country in the world of equal area in which nature has been so liberal in scattering her treasure. Her commerce finds an outlet to the ocean through the Capes of the Delaware; the great interior is filled with mountains of mineral, intersected with beautiful rivers and valleys; while her western slopes embrace the heads of the Ohio, and hold as it were in her grasp the keys of the great valley.

England may boast her Birmingham and her Sheffield. Already in the city of Pittsburg a successful rival is to be found to either. This great State alone is capable of sustaining a population of twenty million souls. There is really no limit to her capacity to produce. The value of her western coal-fields alone is beyond computation. The material for driving machinery is to be found at the base of every hill. All this is inseparably connected with the Union and a stable Government. We know the story of our colonial history and our struggle for independence and for the establishment of our present system of constitutional government. Let it be remembered that revolution is a word popular in every language; and that decay is stamped on all the works of man. That the greatest of American writers, as a check to human ambition, has pointed to Westminster Abbey, which contains the tombs of so many illustrious Britons, as the "empire of death," where the greatest name perishes from record and recollection, and its "very monument becomes a ruin." Such is the fate of nations as well as of individuals. Greece, the early home of the arts and the sciences, owed her distinction to her republican institutions as well as to the republic of letters; but with civil dissension came corruption, and civil war wreaked its vengeance upon her fair fields and beautiful cities. The Turk has reveled amid her broken statuary and fallen columns. The clang of the saber in defense of her ancient liberties has long since ceased to be heard on the field of Marathon or at the base of the Acropolis. Her sun went down in the night of barbarism and savage debasement. Rome, a nation that laid broad and deep the foundation of a lofty civilization, whose poets, orators, statesmen, and historians shone like the milky-path in the heavens, and whose works are models at the present day, yielded to a similar spirit, and her power and glory have long since departed.

"Time, war, flood, and fire
Have dealt upon the seven-hilled city's pride.
She saw her glories, star by star, expire."

Shall this noble experiment of free Government, this model Republic, in the morning of its existence be doomed to share a similar fate, and liberty find a grave in the land that has been crimsoned with the blood of her martyrs, and that contains within her bosom the ashes of her Washington? No! Let the young America rise superior to the shackles of party and sectional interest, and with renewed energy and patriotic devotion cling to the Constitution of our fathers as our only hope, and as Mr. Webster has so beautifully expressed it, as the mariner clings to the last plank when night and the tempest close around him. Before the conclusion of the remarks of Mr. Dawson his hour expired, whereupon Mr. BAKER obtained the floor, but yielded to

Mr. SPALDING, who moved that the time of Mr. Dawson be extended so as to allow him to conclude his remarks.

The SPEAKER. That will require unanimous consent.

Mr. STEVENS. I must object to that. When a gentleman of my own party [Mr. BINGHAM] was speaking, and an extension of his time was asked, I gave notice that so far as I was concerned I should object to the extension of time in any other case. I cannot depart from that notice, although I am sorry to apply the rule to my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Dawson.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Let the gentleman have leave to print the remainder of his remarks.

Mr. HILL. I desire very much that the gentleman [Mr. STEVENS] shall yield his objection, so that I may have an opportunity of putting a question to his colleague, [Mr. Dawson.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania insists on his objection.

Mr. Dawson. Then I give notice that with my consent there shall never be another extension of time so long as I am a member of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BAKER] is not desirous of going on to-night, I will move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, so that we may pass an appropriation bill which it is very necessary to pass to-day.

Mr. BAKER. That is entirely satisfactory to me.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois will be entitled to the floor when the House resumes the consideration of this subject.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. BLAINE.]

WAR DEBTS OF LOYAL STATES.

Mr. BLAINE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House recommitted to the Committee on War Debts of the Loyal States the bill (H. R. No. 998) to reimburse the States that furnished troops to the Union Army for advances made and expenses incurred in raising the same.

The SPEAKER. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 896, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

The CHAIRMAN stated the pending question to be upon the following amendment, offered by Mr. BENJAMIN:

In lines eight hundred and ninety-eight and eight hundred and ninety-nine strike out the words "and additional compensation of officers and clerks;" so that the clause will read as follows:

For salaries of additional clerks, under act of August 6, 1846, for the better organization of the Treasury, at such rates as the Secretary may deem just and reasonable, $60,000.

Mr. Dawson moved to amend the amendment by striking out the last word; and proceeded to deliver the concluding portion of his speech as printed in the foregoing proceedings. Before closing he was interrupted by Mr. STEVENS, who said: Mr. Chairman, are we not in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the special order, the legislative appropriation bill?

The CHAIRMAN. Yes, sir; and the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dawson] has moved an amendment, on which he has the right to speak for five minutes.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not see the pertinency of the gentleman's remarks. The pending amendment relates to additional clerks.

Mr. Dawson. The gentleman will doubtless see the applicability of my remarks before I conclude.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dawson] will proceed.

Mr. Dawson resumed and concluded his speech.

Mr. HILL. I rise to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. Dawson.] I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the high eulogy pronounced by the gentleman upon the present occupant of the White House for acts done by him prior to the time when he became either President or Vice President. I desire to ask the gentleman whether those eminent qualities which he has so highly eulogized were sufficient to induce him to vote for Mr. Johnson for Vice President in 1864. I will yield the gentleman enough of my time to allow him to answer.

Mr. Dawson. The gentleman asks me whether I voted for the nominee of his party in 1864. I will only say that the question has nothing to do with principle.

Mr. HILL. I am not sure whether I understood correctly the gentleman's answer. I understood him to say—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I rise to a question of order. I submit that both the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Dawson] and the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. Hill] are out of order, as the legislative appropriation bill is the special order, and the remarks of the gentlemen have no relation to that subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. Dawson. I withdraw my amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now upon the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BENJAMIN.]

Mr. STEVENS. I hope that amendment will not prevail. This is the estimate for the officers now employed in the sub-Treasury department of the Government. It is precisely the same heretofore provided for by law and in the words of the law. It is for carrying on the sub-Treasury according to the law passed in 1846.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. For the purpose of finding out whether there is a quorum I call for a division on the amendment. This is an important appropriation bill, and I have no idea of its being considered without a quorum.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 19, noes 20.

The Chairman ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. FARNSWORTH.

The committee again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 62.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of additional clerks and additional compensation of officers and clerks, under the act of August 6, 1846, for the better organization of the Treasury, at such rates as the Secretary may deem just and reasonable, $60,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to strike out in line nine hundred and one "at such rates as the Secretary may deem just and reasonable."

It was agreed by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] who had charge of the bill, that these words should be stricken out and that "at existing rates" should be inserted in their stead, which I also make a part of my amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For salaries of ten supervising and fifty-nine local inspectors, appointed under act of the 30th August, 1852, for the better protection of the lives of passengers by steamboats, with traveling and other expenses incurred by them, including the expenses of their annual meeting, $100,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to insert after the word "meeting" the words "and for a more thorough investigation of the cause of disaster to vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam."

Mr. Chairman, one word in regard to that matter. I shall move a further amendment after this is adopted. I introduce the amendment for the purpose of giving additional authority to these supervising inspectors to investigate into the cause of these disasters. As chairman of the Committee on Commerce, I have had several conferences with the Secretary of the Treasury on this subject. There was the Evening Star, where there was a great loss of life. There was the Fashion, at Mobile, where three or four hundred lives were lost. There was the more recent disaster of the steamer Commodore of the Sound line.

There are a great many vessels which during the war were under charter by the Government, but which since the Government has dispensed with them have gone into the service of private corporations. These vessels are put again in use, although in many cases they have been proved to be unseaworthy. There is the case of the Commodore, and it is one of the most flagrant of which I have any information. It was a steamer plying on Long Island sound, on one of the great lines of travel between Boston and New York. It was deemed so unseaworthy that the supervising and local inspectors had refused to give a license, yet the owners of that line, in utter defiance of law, ran that steamer, exposing the lives of hundreds of passengers every night. And, sir, it was a miracle that every life on board was not lost.

I desire the Treasury Department may be invested with authority to make most stringent investigations. And I hope in the case of the Commodore there will be a criminal prosecution entered against every man who had anything to do with running her. Under the circumstances I hope the amendment will be adopted, and then I will ask that an additional appropriation be made to carry it out.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. In order to make this effective, if these investigations and prosecutions are to go on, I move to increase the appropriation from $100,000 to $110,000. I desire the Government shall be armed with sufficient authority to prosecute all the men who have been arraigned.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Judiciary—office of the Attorney General:
For salaries of the Attorney General, assistant attorney general, and the clerks and messenger in his office, $27,500.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to insert after the words "assistant attorney general" the words, "law clerk and chief clerk."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For traveling expenses of the judge assigned to the tenth circuit for attending session of the Supreme Court of the United States, $1,000.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move to strike that out.

Mr. HIGBY. I rise to oppose the amendment. I hope it will not prevail.

Mr. GRINNELL. I see no appropriation for the traveling expenses of the judge who resides in my State of Iowa; and if this provision be retained I shall move to appropriate two hundred and fifty or five hundred dollars to him for that purpose. But I am opposed to this altogether. This is nothing more than a gratuity to this gentleman.

Mr. HIGBY. This is established by law.

Mr. HILL. I rise to oppose the amendment. I suppose this appropriation would not be put in the bill if there was no sum provided by law for this purpose for the judge of the tenth circuit. This is carrying out the provisions of an existing law. The amount may be considered large, but the law exists, and we certainly ought not to repeal it in this underhanded way. Let it be done fairly if it is to be done at all, and not by striking out a provision in an appropriation bill to carry out an existing law.

The amendment was disagreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For facilitating communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States by electrical telegraph, $40,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to strike out this clause.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. This item was stricken out of the deficiency bill, and to be consistent the House should strike it out of this bill for the coming year. I understand there has been a very flagrant violation of the contract on the part of the telegraph company, and for that reason the Senate struck out this item.

Mr. STEVENS. We ordered this to be stricken out in the deficiency bill, and it should be stricken out of this, upon the ground that the company have not complied with their part of the contract, as I am informed the Senate on investigation have discovered, and accordingly refused to pay it.

Mr. DODGE. This appropriation of $40,000 is for the fulfillment of a contract with the telegraph company which was made, as I understand, five or six years ago, when there was no telegraph line between the Atlantic and Pacific States. For the purpose of aiding the telegraph company in constructing a line from the Missouri river to San Francisco the Government entered into a contract to pay them this sum every year for ten years. The money has been paid for a number of years, and the telegraph company have fulfilled the contract on their part. They have constructed the line and transmitted messages for the Government under the terms of the contract from year to year. In addition to the line which they constructed under the contract, which is now the old line, and which has recently been interrupted by Indian depredations, they have a new line, and they are from day to day transmitting messages for the Government over it. They claim that they have fulfilled their contract, and they are ready now to submit the question of fulfillment to any committee of Congress. Indeed, they have been before a committee for that purpose. This appropriation was ordered for the purpose of facilitating communication between the Atlantic States and the Pacific. We are now in daily intercourse by telegraph, and yet gentlemen seem to think it is of no consequence whether this contract should be carried out or not. I trust the appropriation will not be stricken out without full consideration on the part of the House.

Mr. STEVENS. This House has twice inserted this same appropriation, and the Senate has twice stricken it out, and the House acquiesced upon the assurance on the part of the Senate that the company had not fulfilled their contract. Now I propose that we strike it out here, and if the company have fulfilled their contract to the satisfaction of the Senate, which has investigated the matter, and the Senate shall insert it and send it back to us, we will then concur.

Mr. DAWES. I would inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania whether he has any knowledge of the fact of the violation of the contract?

Mr. STEVENS. None except what I have received from the chairman of the Committee on Finance in the Senate, who assured me that the company had not complied with their contract.

Mr. DAWES. It seems to me that as this is a contract, unless we have knowledge of our own to justify us in refusing the appropriation, it would be hardly right for us to throw the responsibility upon the other branch of Congress. Let us fulfill this contract on our part unless we can put our fingers upon some specification that will justify us in declining to do so.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken on the amendment; and there were—ayes 34, noes 18; no quorum voting.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I suggest to the gentlemen who are opposed to striking out this item that they allow it to be stricken out in committee and have a vote upon it in the House.

Mr. DAWES. I suggest to the gentleman that unless we have some reason given for not doing so we leave it in, in fulfillment of our contract.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is a swindle involving hundreds of thousands of dollars.

Mr. DAWES. My friend from Illinois is in the habit of calling everybody a swindler who has any claim upon the Government.

Tellers were ordered on the amendment; and Messrs. DODGE and FARNSWORTH were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 57, noes 40.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RADFORD. I rise to a privileged motion. I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope not. We can easily get through this bill to-night.

Mr. RADFORD. We cannot get through the bill to-night. It is half past four now and I am hungry. [Laughter.]

The question was taken on Mr. RADFORD's motion; and the committee refused to rise.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to strike out the following clause:

For salary of the reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, $2,500.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

For salary of the reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, $2,500, if one volume only of the reports is published as heretofore; and in case the Supreme Court should direct him to publish two volumes, then the sum of $2,500 for each volume so published.

By law this reporter's fee is $2,500 a volume. It was supposed when this pay was fixed that one volume would contain all that it would be necessary to report. It is thought now that owing to the increase of business the Supreme Court will direct two volumes to be published, and if they do that of course there must be an additional appropriation of the same amount. The contract with the reporter only extends to a single volume. I understand the probability is that the Supreme Court will find it necessary to have another volume published in order to disseminate all their opinions.

Mr. HALE. Do I understand the gentleman to say that under existing law this reporter is paid by the volume and not by the year?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. No, by the year.

Mr. HALE. I supposed he was paid by the year.

Mr. STEVENS. He was only to furnish one volume a year.

Mr. HALE. I know that has been the practice, and I only wish to say that for one it strikes me, as a lawyer, that the true rule of policy would be the reverse of that proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Let us pay him $2,500 if he publishes only one volume, and a less salary if he publishes two volumes.

Mr. RADFORD. I rise to a question of order. There is more than one gentleman upon the floor discussing this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman from New York [Mr. HALE] to be opposing the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS.]

Mr. HALE. I rose to oppose the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania; and I believe that I am in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is in order, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] having surrendered the floor.

Mr. HALE. It seems to me that the tendency to increase and multiply these reports by filling up volumes with the arguments and points of counsel, which might be condensed very materially, thus adding to the value of the reports, ought not to be encouraged by Congress by making the salary of the reporter depend upon the number of volumes he shall produce. I therefore hope that this amendment will not prevail, but that we shall leave this reporter at an annual salary.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will ask how much per volume the reporter gets for the copyright independent of his salary? It is something very considerable; and if we should pass the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS:] it would make his salary some $8,000 or $10,000 a year I reckon.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. STEVENS; and being taken, it was not agreed to.

The Clerk resumed the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

For continuing the collection of reliable statistical information concerning the gold and silver mines of the western States and Territories, which shall include the labor and capital employed, the product and the modes of working the same, which information shall be reported to Congress, $10,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to reduce the amount to be appropriated by this clause from $10,000 to $5,000. I was in hopes that this provision never would appear in another appropriation bill. We have made enough appropriations of this character, without continuing them year after year in the appropriation bills. It looks to me very much like jobs to enable parties to get certain amounts for specimens of minerals. I think that private enterprise can give us all the specimens that are necessary without bleeding the public Treasury for that purpose.

I did move to reduce this amount from $10,000 to $5,000. I will withdraw that motion, and move instead of that to strike out the entire clause.

Mr. HIGBY. I hope that motion will not prevail. This amount was given last year, I believe, to the gentleman appointed to make this investigation. Mr. J. Ross Browne, the gentleman appointed by the Secretary of the Treasury, has already sent a report to Congress, and has communicated with the delegation from the mining States on that subject. He recommends an appropriation even larger than this, but he does not ask that he be continued in the position. He says in his letter that he knows there are many men who can perform this service better than he can, and he is ready to turn it over to anybody else whom the Department may see proper to appoint in his place. But he says that he thinks it is for the interest of the country that this investigation should be continued; and for that purpose he recommends an appropriation larger than the one in this bill, even as high as $25,000. He has sent in a report, which is now in the hands of the Public Printer, making some five hundred pages; and he writes me, in a letter upon the subject, as I have no doubt he has written to other members; that he has but just entered upon this investigation, and recommends that it be continued. I therefore hope that this appropriation will not be stricken from the bill.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The question seems to be whether we shall ingraft upon the Government a department of mineralogy.

Mr. HIGBY. I think it would be well to do so.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. We were told last session, when this appropriation was made, that it was to enable the Government to accomplish a certain purpose, and that the amount then appropriated would be sufficient. And yet more is asked for now for the same purpose. This time $25,000 was asked for; but the committee have cut it down to $10,000. Next year they will ask for $50,000, which may be cut down to $25,000. I hope this appropriation will not be made.

Mr. HILL. I am not sure but we would lose very much if we were not to make the appropriation asked for in the clause now under consideration. I do not know what we should have done for those interesting articles in Harper's Magazine upon "Washoe mines and mining," and articles of like character, if Mr. Browne had not had this money to travel upon. For that reason it might not be expedient to strike out this appropriation; I can see no other reason for making the appropriation.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend the clause proposed to be stricken out by reducing the appropriation from $10,000 to $5,000.

Mr. McRUER. I hope that motion will not prevail. As I understand it, an appropriation has only been made for last year. Mr. Browne was sent out by the Secretary of the Treasury to perform this investigation. He has commenced his labors and has already sent in to Congress a very elaborate report in regard to the mineral resources of California. He proposes to continue that investigation, and calls to his aid there all the intelligence upon the subject in the mineral regions. If there is any one subject upon which Congress may well be enlightened it is upon the resources of this vast mineral region, its wants, its necessities, and its capacities; and I do not believe that $10,000 or even $20,000 can be more properly or more usefully applied than in supplying not only to Congress but to the country a good degree of intelligence in regard to that vast territory now filling up so rapidly. Therefore I hope the amendment will not prevail.

This sum of $10,000 is a very small sum upon which to continue this investigation, for Mr. Browne has to employ a corps of laborers upon this work. As to his having traveled around California upon this money while preparing articles for publication, it is no such thing. His articles for Harper's Magazine, which no doubt the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HILL] has read with much interest, and from which he has doubtless derived a great amount of information, were written long before any such appropriation as this was made; and in my opinion there is no man more honest or more competent to continue this investigation, or with more intelligence upon the subject, than the gentleman who has been designated for the purpose by the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I trust that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will not be agreed to, but that we will strike out this entire clause. We appropriated last year $10,000 for this purpose. Opposition to it was made in the House at the time, and nobody anticipated that we should be asked for more. But $25,000 more was asked for, which amount has been cut down to $10,000 by the Committee on Appropriations, for obtaining information which can be got elsewhere without one dollar of expenditure, and for which one dollar ought not to be expended by us.

Everything in relation to these mines and the collection of this statistical information can be had without this appropriation. The gentlemen from California who come from a mining country have urged this appropriation. Sir, I, too, come from a mining country. I, in conjunction with my friend from Wisconsin, represent the richest lead mines that there are in the world; yet we do not come here and ask an appropriation to have spread before the country at the public expense statistical information in regard to those mines.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Nevada. I desire to move an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. No further amendment is now in order.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. STEVENS, it was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, to strike out the clause.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk, resuming the reading of the bill, read the following:

For compensation to the laborer in charge of the water-closets in the Capitol, $538.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend by striking out "five" in the clause just read, and inserting in lieu thereof "four;" so that the clause will read:

For compensation to the laborer in charge of the water-closets in the Capitol, $438.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation to the public gardener, $1,400.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to amend by striking out in the clause just read the words "four hundred" and inserting in lieu thereof "forty."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For compensation of five watchmen in reservation No. 2, $4,500.

Mr. PRICE. I move to amend by striking out the clause just read. I understand this reservation is a garden, and I do not see any use in spending $4,500 upon it in addition to paying for doing the work.

Mr. STEVENS. The law authorizes the employment of these men, and they are employed. The only question is whether we shall pay them according to the contract.

Mr. PRICE. The law does not compel their employment.

Mr. HILL. I would inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] what information he has in regard to the fact of their being employed. Are they in fact employed, and is their employment necessary at all?

Mr. STEVENS. They were employed last year, and they are now.

Mr. PRICE. This is to pay for services to come.

Mr. HILL. Has the gentleman from Pennsylvania any information whether it is necessary to continue their employment?

Mr. STEVENS. In regard to that I have no information. At the time the law was passed that matter was examined, and the employment of these men was thought necessary.

Mr. HILL. I hope the motion to strike out will be agreed to.

Mr. BERGEN. I move, as an amendment to the amendment, to strike out "five" and insert "three;" and to strike out "$4,500" and insert "$2,700;" so that the clause will read as follows:

For compensation of three watchmen in reservation No. 2, $2,700.

Mr. Chairman, I think that two or three watchmen, probably three, are necessary to take charge of this reservation, especially during the night-time. On this reservation experiments are made in the cultivation of various plants; and the laborers employed there during the day cannot watch the grounds during the night. It is well known that in that vicinity extensive depredations are committed upon gardens and cultivated land. I consider, however, that five watchmen are more than are necessary.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

The amendment of Mr. PRICE was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Metropolitan Police:

For salaries and other necessary expenses of the Metropolitan police for the District of Columbia, $208,850. And the compensation of said Metropolitan police force, officers, and clerks, &c, and the same is hereby increased fifty per cent. upon the amount hereby appropriated, commencing on the 1st day of July, 1865, said increase to be borne by the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, in the proportion equal to the number of patrolmen allotted severally to the city of Washington, to the city of Georgetown, and the county of Washington and Georgetown, and the levy court of said county be, and they are hereby, authorized and empowered to levy a special tax not exceeding one quarter of one per cent. for the purpose aforesaid.

Mr. RADFORD. I want to know what the originally pay was? I move to reduce it to twenty-five per cent.

Mr. STEVENS. Fifty per cent. was authorized before, and we thought it was right.

Mr. RADFORD. I do not think we ought to make it fifty per cent. without knowing what they get now.

Mr. MORRILL. Why does this section go back to 1865 if a like appropriation was made before? This increase of fifty per cent. goes back a year further than the one increasing the salary twenty per cent.

Mr. STEVENS. We increased the salary of these men a year ago, and provided that these corporations should pay one part and the Government should pay the remainder, but we did not make an appropriation.

Mr. FARQUHAR. I move to reduce the amount to twenty per cent.

Mr. RADFORD. I accept that.

Mr. HILL. In regard to going back to 1865, I insist that was proper. Our effort was to relieve men serving at an inadequate salary on account of the price of living and the depreciation of the currency. I do not think we go back far enough even when we go back to 1865.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. BERGEN. I move to insert "1866" instead of "1865," and I do it upon this ground: a few days ago we took occasion to increase the pay of the clerks in the several Departments, commencing with 1866, and I do not see why we should depart from the rule we then adopted. If it was right then to commence in 1866, it is right now.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I find the following to be the estimate of the Department:

And the compensation of said increased force is hereby increased fifty per cent. upon the amount hereby appropriated, commencing on the 1st day of November, 1866; said increase to be borne by the cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the county of Washington, in the proportion equal to the number of privates allotted severally to the cities of Washington and Georgetown and the county beyond the limits of said cities; and the corporate authorities of said cities of Washington and Georgetown, and the levy court of said county, be, and they are hereby, authorized and required to levy a special tax not exceeding one quarter of one per cent. for the purpose aforesaid.

My impression is fifty per cent. is none too much. Their salary was very low before this increase. I do not remember precisely the amount. I remember the committee examined this question, and that we came to the conclusion this was no more than an adequate increase. It seems to me, however, this should be amended so as to commence on the 1st of November, 1866, and to give fifty per cent. I move to substitute the clause I have read for the one now before the House.

Mr. BERGEN. I accept that as a modification of my own amendment.

The amendment as modified was agreed to.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I understand that amendment as accepted, and I now move to add the following proviso:

Provided, That no person shall hereafter be employed as police or watchman who has not served one year in the Army of the United States and received an honorable discharge.

Mr. HALE. I wish simply to suggest to the mover of this proviso to modify it so he will say "no person hereafter shall be appointed," &c., for there may be, and probably are, though I know not the facts of the case, very valuable officers who cannot be spared who will have to be removed if the proviso passes as it now is.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. What, watchmen?

Mr. HALE. The office of policeman or watchman does require skill and experience if anything does in the world.

I have only to say I am disposed to do everything that ought to be done to reward our soldiers, but I do not think by such an amendment we ought to remove such men from the performance of their functions against whom no allegation is made. I know nothing of these men; but the effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois is simply to remove the entire police force of the District of Columbia. I think the proposition is too sweeping and ought not to be adopted.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. The proposed amendment provides that no person shall hereafter be employed, and I am willing to accept the modification of "appointed" for "employed," who has not been wounded or served at least one year in the Army.

Mr. RADFORD. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "one year." If he has been in the service at all that qualifies him as well as if he had been there ten years. If he has been in the service one year and has been honorably discharged he should have the same right as a soldier who has been in the service four years.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I accept the amendment.

The amendment of Mr. HARDING, of Illinois, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. STEVENS. I move a verbal amendment in the last paragraph of the bill by striking out the words "and Georgetown." It now reads "county of Washington and Georgetown," which is incorrect.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move to add the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That the proviso contained in the third section of chapter two hundred and ten of the act of July 2, 1864, shall be construed to embrace all suits to which the United States shall be a party, either plaintiff or defendant.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I would like some explanation of this.

Mr. STEVENS. A provision was inserted in the appropriation bill in 1864 upon this subject which I supposed then and still suppose was large enough to embrace the Court of Claims; but the Court of Claims decides that it does not apply to them; and they have directed an amendment of this kind with a view of enabling them to conform to that provision of the law.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. This is a judicial question. I think it altogether out of place in an appropriation bill, and shall insist that it be considered by a quorum of the House, and I believe there is no quorum now.

Mr. JENCKES. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] has overlooked a statute subsequent to the passage of the appropriation bill of 1864, which essentially modifies the provision to which he has alluded. I think with his colleague [Mr. RANDALL] that this matter had better be reserved and introduced as a separate bill.

Mr. STEVENS. I have no objection to that course, and I therefore withdraw the amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I ask leave to move an additional amendment in regard to losses of vessels propelled in whole or in part by steam, by adding the words "and for the prosecution for violations of said act."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move to amend by adding the following section:

And be it further enacted, That to enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay the increased compensation voted by the House during the Thirty-Ninth Congress, to its employees, clerks and others, and to pay the increased rate of compensation thereby authorized, a sum sufficient therefor is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. STEVENS. It will not do to pass that here now. I move that the committee rise.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I would like to have the question taken on my amendment.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Can the committee rise and report the bill as long as there is an amendment pending?

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. There can be no objection to the amendment. We have agreed to pay this money, and we may as well appropriate it.

Mr. STEVENS. I am willing it shall come up in the morning.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. We may as well have the vote now.

The question was put; and the chairman announced that the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I call for a division.

The question was again put; and no quorum voted.

Mr. STEVENS. I think the committee had better rise.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Well, I have no objection, if it is understood that the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 896, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I rise to a question of order. When the committee rose I understood there was an amendment pending.

The SPEAKER. The chairman reported it to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. That is not strictly correct as an amendment was pending and not acted upon.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed by the Clerk that the amendment was declared adopted by the chairman of the committee and was reported by him with the other amendments to the House.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles:

An act (S. No. 456) for the admission of the State of Nebraska into the Union;

An act (S. No. 462) to admit the State of Colorado into the Union; and

An act (S. No. 177) to incorporate the National Safe Deposit Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. CLARKE, of Kansas, for two weeks.

And then, on motion of Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of T. Foster, and others, citizens of Newton county, Indiana, praying that there may be no curtailment or withdrawal of the national currency.

Also, the petition of A. S. McCullough, Wm. Ross, C. L. Urnston, S. Bramble, N. West, and others, citizens of Newton county, Indiana, praying that there may be no curtailment or withdrawal of the national currency.

By Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio: The petition of Charles A. King, and others, citizens of Toledo, Ohio, against a reduction of the national currency, &c., and against compelling national banks to redeem their notes in New York city.

Also, a petition from M. Shoemaker, Esq., and others, citizens of Toledo, on the same subject.

Also, a petition from Samuel Blanchard, and others, citizens of Toledo, on the same subject.

Also, a petition from H. Rudd, Esq., and others, citizens of Wood county, Ohio, praying for the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.

Also, the petition from Hon. W. T. M. Amy, acting Governor and secretary of the Territory of New Mexico, praying for relief, &c.

Also, the petition of B. E. Lehman, and others, citizens of Bethlehem, Pennsylvania, praying the House of Representatives to present articles of impeachment against Andrew Johnson, President of the United States, for certain high crimes and misdemeanors therein named.

Also, the petition of John F. Compton, and a large number of citizens of Dalton, in the State of Georgia, praying for the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, President of the United States.

By Mr. BENJAMIN: The petition of citizens of Schuyler county, Missouri, against any further reduction of the currency.

By Mr. BOYER: The petition of citizens of Cata-sauqua, in the county of Lohigh, Pennsylvania, in opposition to the passage of an act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or having in view the return within a limited time to specie payments; also, in opposition to the passage of a law compelling all national banks to redeem their circulating notes in New York.

Also, the petition of cigar manufacturers, journey-men cigar-makers, dealers in cigars, growers of and dealers in seed-leaf tobacco, for a change of the present to a specific tax of not more than five dollars per thousand on all domestic cigars, and that the stamp be made a revenue stamp, sold by the collector only to licensed manufacturers in his district, with proper guards and checks to prevent frauds and counterfeits.

By Mr. DRIGGS: The memorial of a committee appointed by the citizens of Ontonagon, Lake Superior, Michigan, setting forth the reasons for and praying Congress to make an appropriation for the improvement of the existing harbor at that place.

Also, a petition of the Board of Marine Underwriters, of Cleveland, Ohio, for the same object.

Also, a petition of the Board of Trade of Cleveland, Ohio, for the same.

Also, a petition of the Chamber of Commerce of Milwaukee, for the same.

Also, a petition of 500 citizens of Lake Superior, Michigan, and Ohio, embracing miners, ship-owners and merchants, for the same object.

Also, the petition of citizens of Milwaukee, praying Congress for an appropriation for the improvement of Marquette harbor, Lake Superior.

Also, a memorial of the Board of Trade of Cleveland, Ohio, for the same object.

Also, a memorial of the Board of Trade of Chicago, for same.

Also, a petition from Ambrose Campbell, P. M. Everett, and 50 others, citizens of Marquette, Lake Superior, Michigan, praying Congress not to pass any law to curtail the national currency.

By Mr. HAYES: The petition of the Cincinnati Relief Union, that Congress will adopt measures to secure greater promptness and dispatch in acting on applications for pensions.

By Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts: The petition of William Clafin, and others, manufacturers of leather, to remove or reduce the tax on leather.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of John Trader, Washington, District of Columbia, praying to be reimbursed for the use of his property by the Government.

Also, the petition of Charles C. O'Neill, for balance due on wood on account of Government violation of contract. Contract dated December 24, 1864.

Also, the petition of H. D. McKinney, for balance due on wood on account of Government violation of contract. Contract dated December 24, 1864.

Also, the petition of the officers of the Anti-Slavery Society of Philadelphia, Pennsylvania, praying Congress to prepare such an amendment to the United States Constitution, to be presented to the several States for ratification, as will forever prevent any distinction in the right of suffrage on account of race or color.

By Mr. MOORHEAD: A petition from 100 citizens of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, against any further reduction of the currency, and against requiring national banks to redeem their notes in New York.

By Mr. MORRILL: The petition of N. G. Pierce, president of Westminster, Vermont, Farmers' Club, and 179 others, members of the club and citizens of Westminster, Vermont, praying for a new tariff law.

By Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts: The petition of Wesley P. Bean, of the nineteenth Massachusetts volunteers, for a pension.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The petition of citizens of Warren county, Ohio, praying that a pension may be granted to Henry Woodward, late of the second Ohio volunteers.

By Mr. VAN HORN, of New York: The petition of 101 citizens of Genesee county, New York, asking the passage of the bill for the tariff on wool now pending before Congress.

By Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts: The petition of Thomas J. Dunbar & Co. and Jacob F. Eaton, for compensation for the use of property on Long island, Boston harbor.

By Mr. WENTWORTH: The petition of W. H. McLean, late United States Navy, for relief.

By Mr. WILLIAMS: The petition of William A. Charlton, of Alleghany county, Pennsylvania, praying for a pension.

Also, the petition of citizens of Westmoreland county, Pennsylvania, protesting against the curtailment of the national currency, the early compulsory resumption of specie payments, and the passage of any law to require the national banks to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting them from paying or receiving interest on balances.

Also, the petition of citizens of Armstrong county, Pennsylvania, praying for the establishment of a mail route from Dayton, in the county aforesaid, to Kerr's Store, in the county of Clarion.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, January 17, 1867.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I perceive that the reading of the Journal does not seem to be near a conclusion, and I therefore move that by unanimous consent it be dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It can only be dispensed with by the unanimous consent of the Senate. No objection being made, the further reading of the Journal is dispensed with.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WILLIAMS presented a petition of Jacob Shavor and Albert C. Corse, praying for compensation for the past use and purchase of an invention for post-marking and cancellation of postage stamps on letters, made by and patented to Marcus P. Norton, of Troy, New York; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WADE. I hold in my hand a long memorial drawn up by a committee appointed by the working men, mechanics, and other employes of the Washington navy-yard, in which they set forth and show very good reasons why their present compensation is not sufficient to support them as they ought to live; that they do not get even as much as the clerks do who are not paid enough, and that their compensation now is no larger than it used to be when money was worth more than it is now, &c. They have argued their case very cogently in this memorial and induced me to believe that their compensation is too low for these times and ought to be enhanced. I move that this memorial of their committee be referred to the Committee on Finance, which I believe has charge of this subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented the memorial of Philip Pond and fifty other citizens of Castleton, Rutland county, Vermont, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, now pending in the Senate; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. HOWARD. I hold in my hand a communication from the United States district attorney of the western district of Michigan on the subject of trespasses on the public lands, inclosing also a decision of the district court of the United States recently made in that district. As the subject is one of a good deal of importance, I beg to present these papers and ask to have them referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

They were so referred.

Mr. WILLEY presented a petition of the mechanics and laborers employed upon the United States Treasury extension, praying that the provisions of the House joint resolution granting increased compensation to the civil employes of the Government may be so amended as to embrace them; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLEY. I also present a memorial of a large number of employes of the glassware manufactories at Wheeling, in West Virginia, praying for an increased duty on glassware produced by the low-priced labor of foreign countries, and also that the internal revenue tax be taken off domestic glass. The matter referred to in the former part of this petition I believe has been reported upon, but that in the other part has not. I move, therefore, that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a petition of clerks in the postal service on railway post offices, complaining that they are not included in the joint resolution passed by the House of Representatives increasing the compensation of Government employes, and praying that the joint resolution may be so amended as to include them; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I present the petition of Henry Frink, of Lancaster county, Pennsylvania, an honorably discharged seaman, setting forth that he enlisted as a private during the late war in the Army; that he was subsequently, by order, transferred to the Navy, and at the close of his service honorably discharged therefrom. He asks for the passage of a law authorizing the payment to him and others in a like situation of the bounty provided by the act of 1866. I move its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I present a petition of citizens of Texas, who represent that they have been devoted to the Union during the dark and bloody period of the rebellion, but that they now find the Government established over them by the assumed authority of Andrew Johnson as much in the hands of rebels as it was during the rebellion, and they now most earnestly appeal to Congress to set aside that government and treat it as null and void. I ask the reference of this petition to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

It was so referred.

Mr. MORRILL presented a petition of Luther Chamberlain and other citizens of the town of Atkinson, Piscataquis county, Maine, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. MORGAN presented three petitions of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which were ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. ANTHONY presented a petition of citizens of Little Rock, Arkansas, representing that in May, 1865, a large amount of property in that city was sold for the alleged non-payment of the United States direct tax, and remonstrating against any legislation to remedy the defects of any such sale; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present a petition of citizens of Cincinnati, Ohio, members of the Cincinnati Relief Union, representing that much distress is occasioned by the delay in acting upon applications for pensions and bounties under the recent law; that many cases of sad distress have been brought to their knowledge where persons have suffered all that it was possible to suffer by the delay in securing to the widows and orphans of soldiers their pensions and bounties. They pray that increased facilities may be granted to the Pension Office to enable them to dispose of the cases as they arise, and for authority to extend temporary relief in certain cases. I suppose this petition should go the Committee on Pensions.

It was so referred.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also offer a petition signed by a number of persons who are either residents or temporary invalids at the Hot Springs in Arkansas. They represent that on account of the difficulty about the title to the lands no improvements can be made to the valuable springs in Arkansas. The title, they think, rests in the United States, but various parties are claiming it, and on account of the dispute about the title the springs are closed and cannot be improved as they ought to be. I move its reference to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN also presented two petitions of citizens of Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, now pending in the Senate; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILSON presented five petitions of officers of the Army, praying for an increase of pay; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented a petition of journeymen cigar-makers and manufacturers of cigars in Massachusetts, praying for a specific tax of five dollars per thousand on domestic cigars, and that the present tariff on imported cigars may remain unchanged; and that Congress will alter the present system of stamping by selling stamps to the manufacturers at five dollars per thousand, and increase the penalty for violating the internal revenue laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. DOOLITTLE presented a petition of journeymen cigar-makers and cigar manufacturers in Milwaukee, praying for a specific tax of five dollars per thousand on domestic cigars, and that the present tariff on imported cigars may remain unchanged; and that Congress will alter the present system of stamping by selling stamps to the manufacturers at five dollars per thousand, and increase the penalty for violating the internal revenue laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, it was Ordered, That C. B. Gardner have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate his memorial praying for compensation for brick used by the United States Army during the siege of Nashville, Tennessee, during the month of December, 1864.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 907) to amend the law of the District of Columbia in relation to judicial proceedings therein, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 177) to incorporate the National Safe Deposit Company of Washington, in the District of Columbia; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 907) to amend the law of the District of Columbia in relation to judicial proceedings therein was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 479) to punish illegal voting in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, reported it with an amendment.

NEW YORK CITY POST OFFICE.

Mr. RAMSEY. I am instructed by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 229) to procure a site for a building to accommodate the post office and United States courts in New York city, to report it back with an amendment; and I am instructed to ask for the immediate consideration of the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires the unanimous consent of the Senate to consider the joint resolution on the day it is reported.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

It appoints the mayor and postmaster of the city of New York, the district attorney of the United States at New York city, the president of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York, and Jackson S. Schultz, Charles H. Russell, Charles H. Rogers, and Moses Taylor, of New York city, a commission to purchase the site for a building to accommodate the post office and United States courts in the city of New York, in accordance with their report submitted to the Secretary of the Interior and the Postmaster General, and by them approved, namely: the lower portion of the City Hall park, containing land equal to twenty-six city lots, (or over sixty-six thousand square feet,) and authorizes them to purchase it for the sum of $500,000, subject to the condition that the Government of the United States shall stipulate that it shall be used for public purposes only; and they are to procure plans and estimates for a suitable building upon the site, to be submitted to the Postmaster General and the Secretary of the Interior; and should such plans and estimates meet their approval they are to communicate them, with such additional suggestions as they may think proper, to Congress; and the Secretary of the Treasury is authorized to pay such sum of money as may be necessary to carry this resolution into effect.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads was in line sixteen of the resolution, after the word "dollars" to insert:

Provided, That the title to said property shall be approved by the Attorney General of the United States.

The amendment was agreed to.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, as amended, and the amendment was concurred in and ordered to be engrossed, and the joint resolution to be read a third time. It was read a third time and passed.

Mr. RAMSEY. I am also instructed by the same committee, to whom was referred the letter of the Secretary of the Interior and the Postmaster General transmitting the report of the commission appointed to select a proper site for a building for a post office, and for the accommodation of the United States courts in the city of New York, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, the subject having been disposed of.

The motion was agreed to.

PAY OF POST OFFICE ROUTE AGENTS.

Mr. RAMSEY. I am also instructed by the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 964) in regard to the compensation of route agents in the Post Office Department, to report it back to the Senate without amendment, and to ask for its immediate consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill, which authorizes the Postmaster General to pay the route agents in the service of the Post Office Department any sum not less than $900 nor more than $1,200 per annum.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I should like to inquire what the compensation of these persons is under existing laws?

Mr. RAMSEY. The maximum is $1,000 at present. They are the most poorly compensated officers in connection with the Post Office Department. They travel night and day, and they are in constant peril, for they travel immediately behind the engine, and when a collision occurs or any mischief happens to the train they are always involved in it.

Mr. CONNESS. You do not propose to pay them $1,200 for that?

Mr. RAMSEY. Partly for that.

Mr. GRIMES. Is there any scarcity of applicants for the places?

Mr. RAMSEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not know whether there is any public necessity for the passage of this bill. I think there are quite a number of gentlemen willing to serve the Government at the present rates of compensation. My correspondence does not lead me to believe that there is any special difficulty in obtaining persons to serve the Government at the rate of compensation now allowed. I believe the rate for these officers is now $800.

Mr. RAMSEY. The maximum compensation is $1,000. It varies from eight hundred to one thousand dollars, at the discretion of the Postmaster General.

Mr. HENDRICKS. It is proposed to leave it at his discretion not less than $900 and not more than $1,200. Why put in the minimum? I shall make no objection to the maximum if the Post Office Department desires it; but I think that part of the bill fixing a minimum had better be stricken out, and I move to strike it out. There are a good many routes where it is important to have agents where but little time is required from them to perform the duty, and I am afraid that this provision will embarrass us in getting the duty performed. I know of one or two instances in my State where the Postmaster General may not be willing to pay a high price, where for a few hundred dollars he could get an agent to attend to the business. I move to amend the bill by striking out the minimum.

Mr. RAMSEY. I think the Senator from Indiana must be mistaken. The service that he wishes to have performed is not of the character described in this bill. Those to whom he refers are not technically route agents. I suppose he has reference to carrying the mail from some locality to some principal office, but the party carrying that mail does not fall under the denomination of a route agent, and hence would not be included in this bill. For some reasons the Post Office Department desires this minimum, and the bill comes in this shape from the House of Representatives. I can see no especial objection to it, and I think it quite as well to retain it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If this is a House bill I shall not press the amendment. I thought it was a Senate bill. I do not care enough about the matter to insist on the amendment. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was read the third time, and passed.

NIAGARA SHIP-CANAL.

Mr. CHANDLER. I move to postpone all prior orders for the purpose of taking up House bill No. 344; and before the motion is put I wish to say that I shall not insist upon pressing the bill to-day if there is objection to it, but I should like to have an early day fixed for its consideration.

Several SENATORS. What is it?

Mr. CHANDLER. The Niagara ship-canal bill. I think it will pass without much discussion. A great deal of time was expended on it at the last session, and I wish to take it up now for the purpose of making it the special order at an early day. ["No special orders."] If there is objection to that, I should like to have it considered to-day. I move to take it up at any rate.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 10, noes 12; no quorum voting.

Mr. CHANDLER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PATTERSON. I ask for the reading of the bill; I do not know what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the bill is asked for; it will be read. ["Oh, no."]

Mr. PATTERSON. The title I mean.

The SECRETARY. The bill proposed to be taken up is the bill (H. R. No. 344) to incorporate the Niagara Ship-Canal Company.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Chandler, Conness, Edmunds, Fogg, Foster, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Morrill, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Ramsey, Sumner, Wade, Williams, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Buckalew, Dixon, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Nesmith, Saulsbury, Sherman, Van Winkle, and Willey—15.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Cowan, Cragin, Cresswell, Davis, Doolittle, Fessenden, Guthrie, McDougall, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Sprague, Stewart, Trumbull, and Yates—17.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be glad to have that clause of the bill read which I believe it contains, respecting the assent of the State of New York, I think it is the last section or the last but one.

The Secretary read as follows:

SEC. 28. And be it further enacted, That this act shall not take effect unless the Legislature of the State of New York shall within two years from the date hereof give its assent thereto.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to strike out that section.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the bill be postponed. The Senator from Michigan stated that his only object was to fix a day for its consideration. It is an important question.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to fix an early day for its consideration. I move to make it the special order for to-morrow at one o'clock, if that will suit the Senate.

Mr. SHERMAN. It is scarcely worth while to set it for so early a day as to-morrow, because it is generally understood that on Monday the tariff bill will come up.

Mr. CHANDLER. I think we can get through with this bill in perhaps a single day. Mr. SHERMAN. I do not think you will get through with it in a week.

Mr. CHANDLER. We may as well, perhaps, take a vote now on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the further consideration of the bill be postponed.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will move next Thursday, if that will suit Senators.

Mr. CHANDLER. I should like to name an earlier day. How long will the tariff bill probably occupy?

Mr. SHERMAN. I have not the slightest idea. The Senator can name his own day. This section is a very important feature of the bill, and as a matter of course it ought not to be voted on unless the whole subject is taken up for consideration.

Mr. CHANDLER. Then I will name to-morrow at one o'clock for this bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. You had better let it go over to a later day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until to-morrow, and that it be made the special order for one o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope that this will not be done, and that the Senator having charge of this bill will not ask it in view of the many important questions before us. This I conceive to be an important one also, but not of the same character: I allude to national questions, questions concerning the revenue, questions involving the peace of the country, involving the industrial and financial interests of the country. I hope that special orders will not be made at this time in favor of any other class of measures. If the Senator from Michigan will give notice that at an early day he will call up this bill, Senators will then have notice to prepare and be ready for action; and if when the Senator calls it up there shall be opportunity for the Senate to consider it, the Senate will not refuse him when he makes the motion. I hope that course will be taken.

Mr. CHANDLER. I consider this bill one of the most important measures now before Congress.

Mr. CONNESS. I have said that it was important.

Mr. CHANDLER. It is very important indeed. It is a bill in which the people of the West take a deep interest, and in which the people of the East are as much interested as those of the West. I do not wish to antagonize it of course with the tariff bill or with any bill from the Committee on Finance, but I should like to have for it early consideration; and I see no reason why we might not take it up to-morrow and finish it during to-morrow and the next day certainly, if not during to-morrow alone.

Mr. WADE. Give notice that you will call it up to-morrow; that is just as good as a special order.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well; then I give notice that I will call up this bill to-morrow at one o'clock; and I now move to postpone the further consideration of the bill until that hour to-morrow.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to inquire whether the motion in that form will make the bill a special order for to-morrow?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the bill has already been made a special order, and therefore if postponed until to-morrow at one o'clock it will not lose that character, but will still be a special order according to the rules of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is it in order to move to amend the motion by striking out the hour named, so as to leave it merely a motion to postpone until to-morrow?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Certainly it is in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the motion by striking out the hour, so as to make it merely a motion to postpone until to-morrow generally.

Mr. MORRILL. I should like to inquire whether that will cut us off from the morning hour?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will not.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well.

Mr. CHANDLER. I accept the amendment, and give notice that I shall call up the bill to-morrow at one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Michigan is modified so as to be a motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill until to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. WADE. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire whether any further legislation is necessary to carry more fully into effect the provisions of the act of last session, (House bill No. 492,) making appropriations for the repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works, &c., which has been referred to by the Secretary of War in his recent report, page 455.

By unanimous consent the Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. WADE. I wish to call the attention of the Committee on Commerce to this subject. The officers of the Department find great difficulty in executing the law of the last session on account of some matters which they set forth, and this resolution points to the place where those statements are to be found. I need not recapitulate them here. I hope the Committee on Commerce will turn their attention to the subject, and make that amendment to the law which the Department seems to think ought to be made.

The resolution was agreed to.

BALTIMORE AND OHIO RAILROAD.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 507.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 507) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the extension, construction, and use, by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, of a railroad from between Knoxville and the Monocacy Junction into and within the District of Columbia," approved July 25, 1866, was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to know why it is thought necessary to take the control of this matter from the mayors and councils of the two cities and give it to Congress? Is it thought that Congress can better judge of a question of this sort? Why change the law in question?

Mr. MORRILL. Congress has been very tenacious of granting the right to change the streets and avenues of this city, or its public squares, or allowing any interference with them whatever, except on its own judgment. It has been so jealous of this heretofore, the city having been laid out according to a plan adopted by Congress, that it has reserved to itself the exclusive right of opening and altering streets. No street can be opened, altered, or changed without the consent of Congress; that is in order that Congress may preserve the original plan, which was a feature of its own adoption.

In addition to that, the Senate was advised by a memorial, which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, that in connection with the authority granted to the city corporation to permit this road to come into the District, and to agree upon the place where it should terminate, and the manner of its coming into the District, they have undertaken to couple with it another act to locate the depot which is now so near us, the present depot of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, and keep it there until the year 1910—an act quite unauthorized and so extraordinary as, I think, to justify Congress in keeping in its own hands the power over that question. If we extend the Capitol grounds it might be an annoyance to have the depot so near us.

These two reasons justified calling the attention of the Senate to the matter. Then I ought to say while I am up that the grant of this power to these corporations was entirely unprecedented on the part of Congress. It had never been done before.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Do they not exercise the power under their general authority?

Mr. MORRILL. No, sir; and it is a thing which the committee are very clear ought not to be permitted to these corporations.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. LANE. I move to take up Senate bill No. 69, to provide for the payment of pensions.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I would suggest to my colleague that as the general question of the tenure of office is now before the Senate in a bill applicable to all offices, so much of this bill as relates to that subject had better be postponed until final action by the Senate on the other bill. I suppose he would not want one rule for the officers generally that are appointed by the President and another rule for the pension agents. If the general law proposed be right it ought to be applicable to these officers; if it be wrong it ought not to be passed. It ought to be general or it ought not to be passed.

Mr. LANE. In answer to that suggestion I will only say that we have passed this bill; we have reached the final vote; it stands simply on a motion to reconsider. I do not know what the fate of the other bill will be. I think I shall vote for that also, but I believe we had better dispose of this now. The House amendment has been agreed to; it stands simply on a motion to reconsider.

The motion of Mr. LANE was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the motion of Mr. MORRILL to reconsider the vote concurring in the amendment of the House of Representatives, as amended, to the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions.

Mr. BUCKALEW. There is only one feature of this amendment in which I feel any particular interest, because, as already stated, it involves a question which is involved in the general bill—the question of the power of removal from office. The Senate will remember that one feature in the amendment is that all the existing officers of this description, that is pension agents, are to be removed from office by this law. It is declared that their commissions, which have been issued pursuant to a former statute, shall expire upon a particular day. That feature of the bill applies to a very few officers; it may not be to one dozen. I think we ought to reconsider this vote in order to reach that question and to remove that feature from the present bill and let it be involved in the general measure which has been before the Senate for its consideration, and which will be regularly in order at the expiration of the morning hour.

Under one clause of the Constitution it is provided that the appointment of subordinate officers may be vested in the President alone, in the heads of Departments, or in the courts of law; and in pursuance of that provision a former law provided that one of the Secretaries, being the head of a Department, should appoint these officers. That was a constitutional law, a very proper law. Under it the Secretary has exercised the authority conferred upon him; he has made appointments; he has issued commissions. The constitutional provision has been executed by the legislative department, and by the Secretary. Now, sir, what is proposed? A thing entirely novel in the history of this Government, that the two Houses by a legislative act shall dismiss these officers from office, shall vacate their commissions. Whether this is done instantly upon the passage of the law or done thirty days hence makes no difference. It is an attempt to remove from office by the Legislature alone, by Congress. It is obnoxious to all the reasoning which upon this point was adduced in the discussion of the general bill; and as it applies to so very few officers, and as it applies only to the period of time which has elapsed since the 1st of October last, I think it ought to be removed from this measure, and the bill ought to stand as it stood when it went from the Senate, before it was subjected to amendment by the House. There is no objection to the passage of the bill originally reported by our Committee on Pensions transferring the appointment of these officers from the Secretary of the Interior to the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; but if we pass any measure carrying out this idea it ought to be prospective altogether; it ought not to involve the larger and more important question of the removal of officers by the Congress of the United States by a direct enactment of theirs, assuming to the two Houses this power of removal. We have had a grave argument in the general debate upon conferring this power upon the President and Senate conjointly in most cases.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I understand that this motion for reconsideration, which I believe is now the pending question, was made by my colleague on account of a desire I had expressed to be heard upon this subject before it was finally acted upon, I being out of the Senate engaged upon other matters at the time of its passage. I wish to state simply that so far as the bill stands now it is acceptable to me personally. I did not like any of the dates that were fixed there, because I reasoned precisely as a great many others did: the date might affect somebody perhaps in whom I am interested; and if a date was to be fixed at all, I wanted one to be safe with the rest of them; and therefore if that kind of legislation was to be adopted I thought I should like to share in its benefits.

But, sir, I want to say further that I was opposed entirely to the adoption of the amendment made by the House. The amendment is for the single purpose of just changing the law and saying, substantially, that everybody who has been appointed by the Secretary of the Interior since a given date shall go out of office unless he is reappointed. It was gotten up unquestionably, I argue from the face of it, for that purpose. It is very likely that the Secretary of the Interior did, in certain cases in other States, as he did in the State of Maine, see fit to remove one pension agent and appoint another, and the object of the amendment as adopted by the House to the bill, it seemed to me, was to say that where he had done so those men should be considered still in office until a new nomination and appointment was made by the President under this law which we now propose to pass. As it stands now it is substantially that; because it leaves the power of appointment just precisely where it was before, since the amendment to the amendment has been adopted by the Senate, with the exception of those appointed since October, 1866, a date which does not cover my man, and leaves him safe enough in office. That is so very late a date as not to touch him. So it is well enough in that particular.

But, sir, I object entirely to this kind of legislation; that is my difficulty. I approved of the bill or submitted to the bill as it was first reported from the Committee on Pensions. That committee said, "Here is an important class of officers, now very important; they disburse a great deal of money, and they are obliged to give heavy bonds; the appointment now is by the Secretary of the Interior, and he may appoint any number of them that he sees fit. It is proper that there should be legislation fixing the number to be appointed, and giving the appointment to the President of the United States, and of course the nominees to be confirmed by the Senate of the United States in the ordinary way." With reference to offices of that importance and consequence I think the proposed law is useful and proper. But, sir, I do not approve of beginning the kind of legislation which is proposed by the amendment of the House; that is to say, fixing up something that shall keep in certain persons against the appointments that have been recently made. To be sure I should not like to have one of my friends turned out. I did not like it in the case that was presented. I was sorry it was so. I should be willing to get him back by every method I could adopt that is consistent with my duty as a Senator; but to legislate that everybody who has been appointed to office since a given date shall be considered as out of office, and everybody who was in before that time shall be considered as in office, is carrying the idea of legislation on the subject of officers further than I am willing to go, further than my judgment approves. Therefore, I shall vote for the reconsideration with a view to see if the Senate will, on reflection, adopt the amendment of the House, or leave the matter just where everything is left of the same description.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think, as this relates to the subject of the main bill that is before the Senate, the decision upon the motion to reconsider had better be postponed until the vote of the Senate upon the bill which is in the charge of the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] I therefore move the postponement of the motion to reconsider until Tuesday next.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up, without a motion, the unfinished business of yesterday, which is Senate bill No. 453.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYN, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 253) to incorporate the First Congregational Society of Washington, with an amendment, and also the bill (S. No. 280) to incorporate the Washington County Horse Railroad Company in the District of Columbia, with amendments, in which amendments it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

TENURE OF OFFICE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 453) to regulate the tenure of offices, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. SUMNER to amend the amendment agreed to as in Committee of the Whole by adding to it the following additional section:

And be it further enacted, That all officers or agents, except clerks of Departments, now appointed by the President or by the head of any Department, whose salary or compensation, derived from fees or otherwise, exceeds $1,000 annually, shall be nominated by the President and appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and the term of all such officers or agents who have been appointed since the 1st day of July, 1866, either by the President or by the head of a Department, without the advice and consent of the Senate, shall expire on the last day of February, 1867.

Mr. McDOUGALL. I desire to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts whether he proposes to discuss the pending amendment, which I understand has been offered by him?

Mr. SUMNER. Before the vote is taken I may have something to say upon it.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Do you propose to withhold your remarks until what you suppose to be the close of the debate?

Mr. SUMNER. I had no purpose on the subject. Should anything occur in the debate which I should think it proper to answer, I shall throw myself upon the indulgence of the Senate to answer it; but I have no purpose on the subject.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Mr. President, that is very much after the fashion of the Senator from Massachusetts. He has no sponsors for his letters. He has correspondents from all parts of the world, but nobody ever heard what were their sign-manuals. And now, undertaking to offer an amendment after the discussion has been engaged in, he declines to make one remark until something has transpired that is worthy of his steel, holding himself to be Brian De Bois Gilbert, I suppose, or else Ivanhoe, who touched his shield, for nobody equal to him in point of arms exists in or about the Federal Senate. The agony of his self-admiration must give him great trouble in the midnight hours.

Sir, this question is a question of office. I undertook to state yesterday—whether I stated it well or not I am not exactly certain; I think

I did state it exactly—there was an eminent French author, from whom the men who established our institutions derived their greatest light, because when Montesquieu wrote his Spirit of Laws, he, in his adaptations, gave reference to everything there was in the old Greek and Latin days. They were familiar with the history of the intermediate States, with the republics of Rome and Venice, and with free institutions as they were developed in Germany, and free institutions as they were developed on the northern shores of the Mediterranean, and as they were developed everywhere. It has seemed to me a singular thing that I cannot find at the present time any going back to the wisdom of our highly-informed fathers. It is true that when I was a lad I thought I knew more than my grandfather did; but as I grew older I found I did not. There is a sort of aspiring spirit that is common to our American people, particularly to those who have got any of the Celtic or Gothic blood about them, and they are disposed to affirm that they know all. My friend from Oregon, [Mr. WILLIAMS,] who is very much of a Celt, is confident he knows it all; and the Erse gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. BROWN,] with his golden locks—he perfectly knows it all. [Laughter.] Now, it was some time said in the days of old antiquity that the high elevation of the soundest philosophy was to know thyself, and I think that was inscribed in the temple at Delphos by one of the wise men of Greece.

In the consideration of these grave questions it is well for us really to consult. How many consultations have there been in this Chamber during the six years that I have had the honor to be here? There have been belligerent controversies. The Senator from Missouri constitutionally affirms what he thinks himself. He does not ask whether any other person thinks differently, and is not prepared to accept any modification upon fair and just consideration. I have seen the time when great men, grave men, wise men sat in this Senate Chamber, and they would ask of each other, what is right about a matter; what should we do; what is for the interest of the State, speaking of the State as the Union, that is the United States, because when we speak of the State here we mean all the States. That has not been done for eight years in this Senate Chamber. This is not Senatus consultum while partisan considerations can control this council, which was designed to be the most conservative of the elements of this Government—equal with the supreme judiciary. There is no consultation now, and has not been, except consultation in caucus. We who live in the northwestern part of the world, where the ice freezes very deep, are not in the council at all, for we are only subject to their judgment. They sit down, a portion of the Senate, and hold their councils and determine what they will do, not understanding that it is the common right of every Senator here to be considered and have his opinions canvassed and his best judgment rendered on the Senate floor. This never occurred until the inauguration of a series of proceedings within the last six years. There never was such a thing as a caucus upon political questions in the Federal Senate before that time; there never was such a thing as a caucus upon political questions in the House of Representatives, nor in any House of Representatives or Senate of the United States of which I have heard. It is now determined by the force of an overwhelming majority that the minority shall have no voice.

I have some recollection of its having been said long ago, and well said, that the tyranny of a majority was the most terrible tyranny in the world. What is it? The tyranny of the raging mob; of such men as hung up to lanterns men in Paris during the Hundred Days; such men as have been asserting the power of a majority—the cruellest, most sanguinary, and desperate ruler of a people. The most terrible tyranny in the world is the tyranny of a majority. So it has been proclaimed from the time when the shells were assigned to the voters of Athens and they sent their great men into banishment.

It is false to say of this Republic that this is a Government of exact majorities and that majorities must rule. That never was the idea of the men who created our foundation. They undertook to balance our institutions. There were both popular and conservative forces; there were the Senate, the lower branch of the Legislature, and the judiciary; and we have much depraved ourselves by falling off from the old lessons and making the judiciary subject to popular influences; for probably above all influences, as it was once thought by the masters whom we have studied, or should have studied, the judiciary was the great anchoring ground of the Government. I never knew the time that I was willing to have a judge hold his term short of good behavior, so that he should be properly tried; and that should be the rule now throughout the country. If he is guilty of any offense he may be accused of the offense; and, by the way, I may say here, and I say it just simply because I am looking at this old, reverend gentleman, [Mr. JOHNSON,]—"Reverdy" means "reverend" I believe—that Lord Bacon, according to our present information, has been long maligned. After he has been dead and rotten now since Queen Elizabeth's time, it has been found out that he was an excellent gentleman, a noble man, and did not steal; but because that red-headed girl who was then Queen of England begged of him to do so he allowed himself to go into ignominy. That is a better piece of subjection than I could submit to. Probably I could have done it if I had been an Englishman.

However, I desire to come back again to the main consideration of the three departments of our Government. I would be pained to have that division forgotten by thoughtful men. It will not be long before I shall part your company, and shall have no opportunity of expressing even a sentiment or an opinion. When we forget the true distinction between the three departments of Government, the executive, the legislative, and the judicial departments, and do not learn how to define them, and do not have the definitions taught in our schools to our boys, we are on the down grade of ruin, and we shall go into a chaotic mass, or chaotic confusion at least. It is not possible to conduct a Government without executive power; it is not possible to conduct a Government without legislative power; it is not possible to conduct Government without judicial power; the three are involved. This is a very old story. It has been taught to us for more than five thousand years. It has been determined by the wisest that they should be entirely separate and distinct. If the executive and the judicial office were combined in one man it would enable him to be a tyrant. If the executive and the legislative were united in one it would enable that power to tyrannize. If the Legislature of the Government should claim, by virtue of its power to pass laws, power to administer laws, power to judge of laws, it would be most tyrannous. All careful, considerate students of the philosophy of republics have said, Let the legislative power be held in check. Senators, who have no particular personal influence, and who are not supposed to be popular politicians, and members of the House of Representatives, have no power to accomplish results except this: they can pass laws.

Now, if the Legislature has a mind to say, regardless of the Constitution of the United States, "This is the law of the United States;" to say, as a Senator once said to me in this Hall, "If it is not constitutional, it is right," and then claim, by virtue of legislative power, executive and judicial power, that would make the most terrible tyranny because they represent an irresponsible majority. I presume there is no Senator who is not conversant with this discussion, as I am myself. Certainly every well-informed man in this Senate should have read this full discussion of the relations of the three departments of Government. It was well discussed in the organization of our Republic. It is well put in the Federalist. It is well stated in Montesquieu, and better referred to by the text he furnishes from the ancient authors. If we cannot maintain the independency of the three powers in this Government, we must abandon it and seek a new organization; and there comes a grave question, and perhaps it may be the gravest question of the age: if the three elements, each intended to be exactly independent so that they should make an equipoise, cannot be maintained in their integrity, if they cannot balance themselves, if the executive can go to the judiciary or the judiciary to the executive, or the executive to the legislative, and combine power, if the moral sense of the country will not correct any such bad, evil, terrible conclusion, we are in chaos. We shall then have to lie at midnight like a vessel in a stormy sea, without hope of the morning, and he who shall see the first star that rises in the eastern horizon will be a prophet of God; for when we are involved in that chaotic condition there is no rule of philosophy, there is nothing in the differential or the integral calculus that can solve that proposition so far as it has been communicated to mankind.

It is in this aspect of the question that I speak of our solemn duty to maintain the theory of our Government as advised by the men who hunted it up from old antiquity. No Senator has read the Federalist who does not know that Hamilton and Jay and Madison hunted everything from the ancient masters, and then they relied principally upon Montesquieu as an index, but they hunted them all, and they framed the only system of a republic that can last. If this Republic does last, it must last upon the proposition of the division of power in three departments of the Government. If they cannot be maintained intact in their integrity, the Republic cannot be maintained. I am confident the Republic cannot be maintained if we cannot maintain those three elements independent of each other, so that we have no right here to question the power of the Executive, and the courts have no right to question our power. We must, upon consultation, inquire what our power is and exercise it only to the limit of our authority; and so of the other branches of the Government.

I have said enough to communicate my opinions, and I say my advice, if you please. If it is not considered to-day it will be considered at some future time, perhaps by more thoughtful and more careful men. I did while I have the floor propose to pursue a branch that is not germane to this question; but from what I see about me I do not care to pursue the subject. I desire now, as a mere concluding sentence, to say that the safety, the continuance, the maintenance of our institutions as a free Government depend upon the maintenance of the three branches of Government intact.

Mr. WILLEY. Mr. President, I have long entertained the opinion that the appointing power, and especially the power of removal from office by the Executive of the United States, was a very dangerous power, liable to abuse, and that if it could be constitutionally done there should be restrictions placed upon it. My opinion in reference to that subject is not the result of recent events connecting themselves with that question, but it has been one long entertained. I believe that it is contrary to the theory of our Government, dangerous to its integrity and to the proper balances of the coordinate branches; and I was very glad that a proposition was introduced for the purpose of applying, if possible, some proper limitations on the exercise of that power. I think it is demoralizing as it now stands, or rather as it has been exercised in times past, both upon the Executive and upon the people, furnishing motives of corruption on the part of the Executive, tempting him for political or personal purposes to the abuse of the power which the the Constitution seems to have placed in his hands, and especially in that construction given to it by prescription and by usage. On the other hand, it is very demoralizing upon the people, upon the electors.

I am not going into the question and did not rise to discuss it particularly, but to express my regret that the Senator from Vermont did not adhere to his original bill, and resist attaching to it any of those appendages which Senators are essaying to put upon it. I should like to see the broad proposition carried out by some general provisions; but I apprehend very much that the proper operation of the principle will be embarrassed, if not destroyed, by attempting to place upon it these various minor restrictions and penalties to which Senators have alluded. It does seem to me that it is derogatory to the character and office of the President of the United States to attempt to surround him or those under him with these little pains and disabilities which have been suggested in the amendments offered by Senators; and however much the power may be abused in the hands of the Executive, I think the only punishment commensurate with the dignity of the executive office, when a corrupt abuse of it really exists, is that already provided in the Constitution, impeachment—that and nothing less.

But, sir, I rose principally to notice some of the remarks which the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] made yesterday while he was discussing the pending amendment. That Senator then said:

"No man can give any reason why three hundred thousand voters in a State should have all the offices in the State, while two hundred and ninety-five thousand voters in that State have no offices at all. Not even those who assail the President most sternly and unrelentingly, I think, will argue that there is any justice and any propriety in that. If these offices belong to anybody and for any other purpose than the public service itself, and if there is to be any rule adopted for the guidance of the appointing power, perhaps that practice is just as good as any other; but the minority would be entitled to its share as well."

I confess to some surprise when that honorable Senator made his statement as to the number of removals from office during the last year. I have no means of knowing the precise number. I take it for granted, however, that the statement of the Senator is correct. He has doubtless informed himself upon that subject. I had formed my opinion in relation to it from what was transpiring around me.

Allow me to say to the Senator to-day that there is but one single civil officer appointed by the President of the United States from West Virginia left in office this day who is in accord with the policy of Congress, or who is not in accord with the policy of the President of the United States, and he is a consul abroad. Every officer in the revenue department in West Virginia has been removed but one, and he has changed his opinion from what we there term loyalty into favor of the policy of the President of the United States. And there are but four men holding civil office to-day, among presidential appointees, in West Virginia, who have not been removed by the President of the United States during the last year. There has been a universal removal; almost all officers have been swept away. If, then, the remarks of the Senator from Pennsylvania be true, that there ought at least to be a fair division, I ask him, upon his own principles, whether there has not been an abuse of the executive power so far as West Virginia is concerned?

The Senator on that occasion further remarked, as follows:

"I think I may say I know something about how these removals were made, some of them, and why they were made. I have no difficulty in standing here in my place and saying that all the removals that I know to have been made by the President were of men who had no respect not only for the Chief Magistrate of the nation, not only for the nation itself, but I thought for themselves. Senators are certainly aware that within the last year a great deal of exceedingly offensive, gross, unwarranted language has been made use of toward the President of the United States. I am satisfied that there is not an honorable Senator here who would not say that where an office-holder, for whose conduct the President was responsible, was guilty of that kind of improper language and want of respect to his superior officer he should be removed."

My experience in West Virginia and my observations there have taught me that the President has been actuated by no such motives. If I am to look to his acts and to the antecedents of his appointees, I must say that he seems to have taken special pains to select from the many respectable gentlemen who have thought it their duty to support his view of the administration of the Government, those very gentlemen who have been loudest and grossest and foulest in their abuse of the President of the United States.

I am not going now to bring into the Senate of the United States matters of a private character, where the parties who have been guilty of uttering this language cannot have an opportunity of defending themselves; but I will select a gentleman who has been appointed to one of the most important and entirely the most lucrative office in the State of West Virginia, who has spread his views at large, who is the editor of a paper, and in his own paper has published to the world his views of the President of the United States, and I will avail myself of this opportunity to show to the Senator from Pennsylvania that the President of the United States in selecting men to office has been actuated by no such motives as those to which he refers. I shall read extracts from the paper of the gentleman to whom I allude, a gentleman appointed to the most lucrative office in the State of West Virginia, and here they are.

Mr. COWAN. What is his name and what is his office?

Mr. WILLEY. His name is Long, and he is postmaster of the city of Wheeling, and he is the editor of a paper published in Wheeling called the Register. He is a gentleman who had, as I have understood, some experience in a certain institution in Wheeling known by the name of the Athenaeum during the war. In his paper of the 13th of March, 1865, he published as follows:

"It is said that Mr. THADDEUS STEVENS, the Republican leader in the House of Representatives, declared that if the House had been in session he would have moved for the impeachment of Johnson. But Johnson is comparatively guiltless. The party leaders who nominated him and who advocated his election, knowing his habits and his character, are the parties who ought to be impeached before the august tribunal of the American people. A gentleman when sober never becomes a thorough ruffian when in his cups. Johnson drunk is but Johnson sober with the mask on; at heart a boastful, low-bred, time-serving braggart; a brutal, tyrannical pimp of power. Those who brought disgrace upon the nation by placing him in the position—not Johnson—must be held responsible before the world."

Again, in the same paper, on the 14th of March, 1865, he said:

"Andy illustrates in the quality of his brain and its brilliancy, as lit up by the alcoholic contents of his stomach, what an uncouth and unadulterated statesman he is, and how strangely the machinery of popular government may be worked when a drunken man is chosen second engineer."

I have a good deal "more of the same sort," but I confess that I have been disgusted in reading thus much.

Mr. JOHNSON. Permit me to ask when that appointment was made.

Mr. WILLEY. The appointment was made sometime in August last, I think.

Mr. JOHNSON. Has it been confirmed yet?

Mr. WILLEY. Not confirmed.

Mr. COWAN. What is the date of the paper from which the honorable Senator has read?

Mr. WILLEY. In giving the extracts I gave the dates.

Mr. COWAN. I beg pardon but I did not hear them.

Mr. WILLEY. I read extracts from the Wheeling Register of March 13, 1865, and March 14, 1865. Rather than read further from it in the Senate, for I confess a loathing and disgust to doing so, I will hand to the honorable Senator, if he desires it, a great deal "more of the same sort" which I have here.

Mr. COWAN. No, that is enough.

Mr. WILLEY. Now, sir, this man uttering this language applies for this position and the President of the United States appoints him to it. I appeal, therefore, to the Senator from Pennsylvania to say whether he is altogether right when he urges that the President has been influenced in making his appointments by a desire to thrust from office men who have been gross in their language of abuse toward the President of the United States.

I do not pretend to say that there is any truth in all these remarks which I have read from this paper. Its editor occasionally pays his respects to an individual much more humble than the President of the United States, and in terms and assertions of alleged facts which I know to be wholly untrue. I am far from wishing to be understood as saying that these vile charges against the President are true. I only mention them in reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania yesterday, that the President ought to turn from office men who indulge in gross abuse of his person or of his administration, and to show him that he has rather exercised his power in appointing men to office who had indulged in such language.

Mr. COWAN. If the Senator will allow me, I say now what I said then: that if gentlemen will make use of this kind of language toward the President and assail him with epithets of this kind, I think it is good cause for the removal from office of any person who does so; and I think furthermore it would be a most excellent cause why such a man should not be appointed to office.

Mr. WILLEY. In both of which opinions I concur with the Senator from Pennsylvania. I believe that men in the discharge of their duty as officers, when appointed by the Executive of the United States, should confine themselves to the duties of their offices; and if there were an amendment proposed to the bill now before the Senate, prohibiting and making it penal (if we are to travel out of the general purpose to go into amendments of that character) for men in office to indulge in partisan warfare or to go beyond the regular discharge of their duties, I should be inclined to vote for it.

But, Mr. President, I am not so much disposed, if disposed at all, to attach blame to the President of the United States for making this appointment. The President of the United States has doubtless been imposed upon. He makes his appointments upon the representations of others. The great fault which the President of the United States committed was in placing the patronage which he had in his power to bestow in the hands of irresponsible men in West Virginia who had an ax of their own to grind. Two of those men who now hold office in West Virginia, that have not been removed, partisans of the President, had much to do in procuring the appointments of these men—one of them a late candidate for Governor of West Virginia and another a candidate for Congress, both overwhelmingly beaten by the people of West Virginia at the late election.

Sir, the people of West Virginia have always had a warm affection and admiration for the present President of the United States. It was West Virginia that first nominated him to the Vice Presidency, that first brought him to the attention of the country for that office. Similarly situated with himself and his compatriots in Tennessee, a border State, suffering the same evils, admiring his indomitable energy and firmness, and relying upon his integrity and loyalty, our people suggested him to the people of the United States as a proper individual to be elevated to the exalted position of the second officer of the United States. But, sir, in an evil hour he has yielded his ear to evil counselors, and has literally carried into fulfillment his threat at St. Louis, that he would "kick" his former friends out of office; and he has left but one single one of those opposed to him in political views of his original friends that elevated him to power in office from West Virginia, and he holds a consulate at Honolulu.

Mr. McDUGALL. I desire, Mr. President, to make a single remark in this connection. In the State from which I come no changes have been made by the President of which I am advised except in a single instance, where an Army officer who had been promoted and had reached a colonelcy for his services in the field was appointed by the President of the United States in place of a person removed from office there. The President has I think been careful to avoid personal questions, and has not carried out fully the wishes of his friends in this matter. I desired myself to see some persons appointed in my own State; but differing from the majority of the Senate, I have not deemed it proper for me to commend any one to office that I did not think should meet with favor from the majority. Since I have been here in a minority I have made no recommendation for office that I did not think deserved the favor of the majority. I believe, however, there is but one instance in my State where a removal has been made by the President and another person placed in office, and in that case the person who was removed was substituted by an officer who had been in the field and done the Commonwealth good service.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, in the remarks I made yesterday my intent was simply to show that the action of the President was represented in this Chamber in an exaggerated form; that is, it was supposed to be much more extensive and to embrace a much wider scope than it really did. In illustration of that I might have referred to the fact shown by the report of the Postmaster General, that in that Department alone there are over twenty-three thousand appointments, and during the past year of all that vast number of appointees only a little over one thousand—about one twenty-third of the whole number—have been removed. It seems to me that almost at any other time, on an occasion of any political change whatever, this number of removals would hardly have created remark.

I have nothing to say as to the language or the libel, as I may call it, of the person whom my honorable friend from West Virginia says has been appointed postmaster at Wheeling. If the case is as he states it I have no doubt the President has been grossly deceived; and perhaps it was the province of my honorable friend to prevent him from being so deceived. But if we take into account the number of these various appointments and the difficulty there is in receiving correct information as regards the applicants, we cannot be surprised that the President, like everybody else, should be deceived, and deceived very often. I confess, for my own part, that I have almost come to the conclusion that I cannot determine anything with regard to the character of an applicant for office, and I have felt very much like declining to have any opinion upon it whatever. You are met by a batch of gentlemen one day, respectable people apparently, who say that such a man is without stain or blemish; and the next day you are encountered by another batch who say that such an appointment would be utterly destructive and fatal.

Mr. CONNESS. That is the misfortune of your position.

Mr. COWAN. Allow me to congratulate my friend on his position; and I hope he will never get out of it. I hope he will never be called upon to judge in a case of this kind.

Mr. CONNESS. I hope not.

Mr. COWAN. I hope so for his own happiness' sake, however ambitious he may be.

Mr. CONNESS. Not at all.

Mr. COWAN. But, Mr. President, we are all sinners, and I suppose that is the first point when a man seeks forgiveness and reconciliation, that he confess himself chief among sinners. I have no doubt that the very pious temperament which I know belongs to my honorable friend from Wisconsin, [Mr. Howe,] and also to my honorable friend from Iowa, [Mr. GRIMES,] is such that that would be the very first exclamation they would make in a contingency of this kind. But being, as I said, all sinners, and all involved in this general calamity which seems to have involved the inhabitants of the planet universally, even down to the honorable Senator from California, [Mr. CONNESS,] we ought to be lenient to the mistakes of one another; and if we should happen to be deceived as to the character of the elect or the saints, and find ourselves mistaken, that I know, in the opinion of my honorable friend from West Virginia, is not matter for eternal or universal condemnation. That is a thing in itself venial, pardonable, and it ought to be so. The common frailties of our nature enjoin us so to consider it.

But, sir, enough of this. What I meant to say in the statement I made to the Senate yesterday was that we were in the habit of exaggerating the errors of our antagonists, we were in the habit of magnifying the faults of our adversaries; and misled by delusions of this kind, blinded by this sort of glare, we might be unjust at times; and I thought a very unjust spirit was manifested toward the President of the United States.

Men change their opinions. Men may have expressed themselves in the heat of temporary excitement as this postmaster at Wheeling expressed himself. Men on the other hand, fickle, unsteady men, quick men I may say, at the outbreak of this controversy with the President manifested themselves in language pretty strongly in his favor. I think I could point out among my friends here some instances where gentlemen expressed themselves very strongly in favor of the President and his policy as being the policy and the only policy which was calculated to restore harmony to the Union and integrity to our institutions; and yet to-day these are the very persons who denounce most violently and most unscrupulously and in the most unwarranted terms that same policy and that same programme which they started out by indorsing.

I trust we shall be able after awhile to comprehend these things in their true significance, understand them as they really are; and not only for ourselves, but for our several parties make the best of them and make the best of them for the country. That, indeed, is the great question. To-day the great question is not what shall be done which is best for the parties of the country or those who expect to be the recipients of party honors and party emoluments, but what is best to be done for that great mass of our fellow-citizens who are not partisans actually in an interested sense, but who are inhabitants of the country and whose future welfare depends upon our action. I think, and I agree with what was said yesterday by the honorable Senator from Maine, and I am glad to be able to indorse it again to-day, that moderation such as he recommends is the true course of wisdom.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, from my youth up I have looked to the Senate of the United States as a body so elevated, so far removed from the prejudices and passions of the times, that no injustice whatever would be done in its action. I have been surprised during the course of this debate to hear what I have regarded as most unjust accusations against the President of the United States; and none perhaps so marked as that of the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. SUMNER.] When discussing this bill the other day that Senator felt himself authorized to say after quoting the line—

"New actions teach new duties."

"We have a new occasion now teaching a new duty. That new occasion is the misconduct of the Executive of the United States, and the new duty which this occasion teaches is that Congress should exercise all its powers in throwing a shield over our fellow-citizens. We see that the Executive is determined to continue this warfare upon the incumbents of office: shall we not if possible protect them? I say that it is our duty growing out of this hour."

The misconduct of the Executive throws upon Congress new duties, is the burden of the argument of the Senator from Massachusetts; and what is that "misconduct?" Not the disregard of any obligation that the Constitution throws upon him, not the violation of any law, except in two particular instances to which he did not refer, but the violation of duty on the part of the President to which he refers is the exercise on his part of a constitutional power which has been recognized from the very first session of the Congress of the United States—the exercise of his power of removal from office and the appointment of other men.

Mr. President, I have never sympathized with the general removal from office. I have never seen a faithful officer removed that I have not sympathized with him except in cases where according to our doctrine of rotation in office that party had held the office, as we understand, long enough. But what is this doctrine of the Senator from Massachusetts? Is it the English doctrine, a doctrine, however, which has been repudiated in the English courts, that a man shall have a right in his office as against everybody else, to hold it as against the party or power in the Government that confers it? Is it the doctrine that because a man is once in office he shall continue in office? I recognize the full force of the argument in favor of the incumbent where he has done his duty. But if he has done his duty, after he has held the office a reasonable length of time, I think he does not have a claim above everybody else in the country.

But what is this charge that the Senator brings against the President? It has been brought down to an exact statement by the Senator from Pennsylvania: out of all the civil officers of the country under his control he has removed one man out of six; he has called into office of the men that sympathized with him in what he regards to be the proper policy one man out of six, leaving five office-holders out of six against him. And this is charged against him as an outrage and a wrong by a Senator who uniformly supported the policy of Mr. Lincoln.

Is it not known to every Senator that in 1861 there was a proscription because of opinion more sweeping and terrible than had ever been known in the country? Until 1861, when was it ever held that every man must be turned out of office who did not agree with the party in power? Scarcely a man was left in office in 1861 to represent the sentiments of the large minority in the country. I bring this up as no accusation against Mr. Lincoln's administration. I did not claim that the men who voted against him ought to be kept in office, and I conceded his right to call into the executive offices men who sympathized sincerely with him in his political views, that he should have confidence not only in his Secretaries but in every executive officer who was to aid him in the execution of the laws; and I never charged him with a wrong because he left no Democrats in office. When the Democrats were beaten in 1860 and the Republican party was successful I thought it right enough for Mr. Lincoln to call men to him and to his support in all the offices of the country—men who truly sympathized with him in his political views—that he should have confidence in all from the highest to the lowest; and I never thought of charging it as an outrage by him, and as a reason why by legislation the whole policy of the Government should be changed in that regard.

The proscription since 1861 has been surpassing anything ever observed before. It has not only extended to the high offices of the country, but to the smaller officers; until it has gone into the courts, and for the past five years in the Federal courts, where the marshal and the clerk control the subject, you would scarcely see a juror called into the box or placed upon the grand jury who did not agree in political opinion with the party in power. The proscription has gone into the courts, and juries have been organized upon political principles. The men called into the grand jury-room to inquire of the violation of law, and who ought to be free from partisan feelings, have been selected with a view to their party politics. I have thought that a wrong, I have felt, as a practitioner of the law, that party politics ought never to find its way into the court. Stopping short of that and leaving it to be felt only in the executive offices, I have no charge to make against the late Administration. But the gentlemen who supported that Administration in this proscriptive policy certainly are not justified in saying that Mr. Johnson, the present Chief Magistrate, is chargeable with wrong if he calls his friends into one sixth of the public offices.

But, sir, is the Senate of the United States the place in which to make the charge of proscription? Of all the employes of this body I know of but one man who sympathizes with the conservative sentiment of the country; and on the first or second day of the session, because of political party views, three of the distinguished chiefs or heads of committees were stricken from their places and assigned to the foot of the committees. I should have no criticism to make upon that if those committees were in charge of matters relating to the political questions of the day; but they had no reference to such questions. The three committees to which I refer have no charge of any question that now agitates the country or divides Congress and the President; but simply because brother Senators differ upon a political question the majority of the Senate proscribe them, and in the middle of a Congress assign them from the head of a committee to the foot of it. And yet Senators say that it is an outrage to proscribe men because of political opinions.

Why, sir, in this very city, under the eye of the President, nearly all the offices are filled by men that oppose him. The postmaster in this city is understood to be one of the leaders of the opposition to the President and of the adherents of Congress. The collecting officer in this District is another instance; and of all the clerks in the Departments my information is that there is not perhaps one out of ten that supports the President of the United States. And yet he is charged with proscription; he is charged with doing a wrong, because some of the officers of the country have been removed and men sympathizing with his policy have been placed in their stead.

I know very well the argument which is used: that Mr. Johnson has proscribed men who belong to the party that put him in power. Well, sir, who have been appointed in their places as a general thing? Not Democrats, not men who opposed the Lincoln and Johnson ticket in 1864; but, as a general thing, the men who have been appointed by this Administration are men who voted for Mr. Lincoln and Mr. Johnson in 1864; and in removing one man and putting in another the President has simply selected among the men who supported him in the contest of 1864. And is it wholly unreasonable that he should make such a selection? Have questions not come up since 1864 that did not enter into the contest of that year? Did the question that now divides Congress and the President enter into the contest of 1864, and was Mr. Johnson elected upon that question? I submit to the candid judgment of every Senator whether the question that divides you from the President formed an issue in the contest of 1864? It did not. Since Mr. Johnson's election, and since he has come to be President of the United States, a question has arisen because of the close of the war, and that question is in what mode shall the States be restored to all their proper relations to the Federal Government.

Upon that great question the President of the United States has assumed his ground; Congress has assumed an opposite ground; and here is a difference, a difference upon a question that has arisen since the President came into power, an unexpected difference of opinion. Undoubtedly his views are honestly entertained by him; and so on the other hand are the views of the majority of Congress honestly entertained by them. That question having arisen, and the President of the United States being charged with the duty to see that the laws are executed, are you willing to deny to him that which you have claimed for every Administration that went before him—the right to put into the public offices of the country men who sympathize with him and in whom he can have entire confidence?

It is charged now as a wrong that he removes one Republican from office and puts another one in. I do not say that this is the case in all instances, for there are instances of appointments to office of men who opposed his election in 1864; but they are very few compared with the appointments that have been made. The great body of appointments that have been made are of men who supported the Lincoln and Johnson ticket in 1864.

Then, sir, this bill proposes to deny to Mr. Johnson as President of the United States that which has been conceded to every President that went before him, to place in the offices of the country, to aid him in the execution of the laws, men who sympathize with him in his views.

A very significant question was asked by the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. Cowan] yesterday. To whom do the offices belong? He answered it well in saying they belong to the law. The man that is appointed is appointed simply to execute the law, to discharge his duty under the law. The office does not belong to him except for the time during which he holds it; he has no patent by which he can hold it beyond the will of the power that conferred it. But suppose the propositions of Senators be correct, that the offices belong to the people, is there nothing, then, due to the large minority in this country? At the recent elections, in October and November last, eighteen hundred thousand voters of this country indorsed the policy of the President; about twenty-two hundred thousand indorsed the policy of Congress. Out of the four million voters casting their votes eighteen hundred thousand men at the polls said they believed the President was right. Do Senators say that those eighteen hundred thousand men, representing nine million of the people of this country outside of the seceding States—do Senators say that that large portion of our population have no rights in the offices of the country; that it is a wrong, for which the President shall be arraigned before the judgment of the country if he does not leave all the offices in the hands of men who oppose his views? The President has thus far not asked to aid him in the execution of the laws a proportion of the officers of the country equal to the popular vote in his favor. He has asked for but one sixth; while of the voters of the country there is nearly one half who sustain him. In the great States of New York, Pennsylvania, and Indiana, giving a popular vote of about one million, forty-four thousand votes cover the majority. A change of forty-four thousand in the enormous vote of these three great States would have thrown them in favor of the President—three States that give about seventy-two electoral votes. And yet Senators say that if the President of the United States respects, in the little matter of appointments to office, this enormous sentiment of the country, he is to be charged with a wrong.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the honorable Senator from Indiana what proportion of the one million eight hundred thousand men to whom he refers voted and determined in 1864 that the war for the Union was a failure?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have not made any calculation upon that subject; and, sir, I know of no portion of the voters of the country who voted that sentiment. I know of no expression of that opinion. I know of a resolution, to which I suppose the Senator means to refer, declaring that thus far, up to a certain time, the war had proved a failure to restore the Union. Eight months after that, in my judgment, that resolution ought to have been proved untrue, and the result of the war ought to have proved that the Union was restored. But, sir, the Union is not yet restored; and until the Senator from Oregon is ready to bring all of the States into their proper relations in the Federal Union upon the basis of the Constitution, until he is ready to admit into the Senate and House of Representatives loyal men who are able to take the oath prescribed by law, he cannot say that the restoration of the Union is completed.

But, sir, I have spoken of the one million eight hundred thousand men who at the late elections voted in favor of the policy of the President of the United States, to say the least of it a very large minority; and when Senators claim that the offices belong to the people, what are the rights of this large minority?

Mr. McDOUGALL. Allow me to ask the Senator from Indiana whether he means to affirm that that question was involved in the late controversy? I do not understand it to have been involved at all in the States where the majority preponderated. I do not understand that the judgment of the people was passed on the question to which he has referred.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I think that in the late elections the difference between the Congress of the United States and the President of the United States did make a very marked issue in the contest, and upon that issue the majority which I have mentioned went in favor of Congress. I am now speaking of the large minority that sustained the President. It is known that upon that question ten of the States were not allowed to express any opinion. In the States that did at the ballot-box express their opinion Congress received the majority which I have mentioned. When you speak of the offices belonging to the people, let me ask what are the rights of this minority of one million eight hundred thousand men? It is not asked, and has not been asked as a general proposition, that the offices should be given to the men who opposed the election of the present Chief Magistrate. It is simply asked that of the men who voted for him in 1864 he should be allowed to bring into office a reasonable number of those who now support him and are in sympathy with him. Is that unjust? Is it an unfair thing to demand, so that the Senator from Massachusetts is authorized to denounce it as misconduct on the part of the President? Is a thing that was so generally sustained by the majority party in 1861 wrong in 1866? I do not understand it so.

Why is it that the President of the United States by public opinion has been sustained in removing men and putting those in office who sympathize with him? It is because in the due execution of the laws he should have his friends to aid him. That is the sentiment of the country upon that question; and now, if it has devolved upon the present Chief Magistrate to see that the laws are executed, why may he not claim that for himself; why may not his friends claim that for him which has been conceded to every Administration that went before him?

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question in that connection? Does the Senator mean to give his approbation to the extraordinary language of the President in which he announced his policy? I refer to the declaration made in the speech at St. Louis that he would "kick out"—that is the word, as I have said before; I put it in quotation marks—kick out of office good Republicans, and that he would return from St. Louis to Washington and commence the work of kicking out. I ask if the Senator from Indiana, who is now vindicating the conduct of the President, means to vindicate that peculiar enunciation of what he intended to do?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Mr. President, the question that the Senator from Massachusetts suggests to me is a question of rhetoric. I cannot say that I like the style that he attributes to the President of the United States. I say this: that the President of the United States, by the judgment of the country in former Administrations, has been sustained in removing from office men opposed to his policy and placing in office men in sympathy with him; but we always express that by the pleasing term of "removal from office." To "kick" a man "out" is but to express the same thought in other language, not quite so agreeable. I have doubted whether the President used that language at all; and after the Senator had concluded his speech, so strong were my doubts upon the question of fact that I went to him in his seat and asked him if he knew certainly that the President had used any such language; he said he thought that he had; that he thought he had seen it in the newspapers.

Mr. SUMNER. I was sure of it.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was unfortunate in not reading that speech, perhaps. I read some of the speeches, but I did not know that I was obliged to read all the speeches the President made on his trip to Chicago, [laughter;] and it may be that I omitted to read that speech. I will not say that the President did not make the remark, for I cannot say that; but I have not met with it, and was surprised when the Senator from Massachusetts charged it upon him.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Allow me a word in this connection?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Well.

Mr. McDOUGALL. The Senator from Massachusetts has undertaken to state what the President of the United States has said while being President without giving exact references or an opportunity to ascertain whether it was really said or not. I say as a matter of order, of privilege if you please, that he is bound to state his authority. That is the law of the Senate, and has been from time immemorial. He does not furnish the day or date or paper even.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator from Massachusetts were to throw upon me the decision of the question I do not think I should say that the President ought to kick anybody out of office, but I would say that it is due to himself, due to the men who supported him, due to the safe execution of the laws, that he should place in a reasonable number of the public offices men who sympathize with him; and that was the judgment of the late Administration which the Senator supported.

But now, when we come to understand the facts, we find that only four hundred and fifty out of two thousand four hundred and fifty or about that number of office-holders have been removed, leaving nearly two thousand men in office opposed to the President or supposed to be opposed to him, and he having called into office only about four hundred and fifty of his friends to support him. This the honorable Senator from Massachusetts calls the "misconduct" of the President. If the Senator had confined his remark to the two cases which have been referred to, where the President after the adjournment of the Senate appointed men who had been rejected by this body, I should have no criticism to make upon his argument. I think that when the judgment of the Senate is expressed upon any nomination that judgment ought not to be reversed by the Executive; but as a question of law I understand the President took the opinion of the Attorney General, a very accomplished gentleman, high in the profession to which he belongs, an ornament to the western bar, an ornament of which we are all proud; and the present Attorney General, I understand, gave it as his opinion that the action of the Senate did not disqualify the party for an appointment after the adjournment. I think it would have been proper for the Attorney General to have gone beyond the question of law and to have said to the President that he owed it to the judgment of the Senate not to appoint a man who had been rejected for that particular office. The legal right and the power of the President under the Constitution to make those two appointments I believe has not been questioned by any Senator.

On the question of propriety I agree with the Senators who have expressed the opinion that such appointment ought not to be made; and if Senators wish to prevent them in the future and will present a resolution expressing the sentiment of the Senate upon that question I shall have no objection to vote for it and let it be known as the opinion of the Senate that a man once rejected by the Senate shall not after the adjournment be appointed to that office. I think he ought not to be; but certainly the facts stated by the Senator from Pennsylvania on that particular question in reference to the appointment of the postmaster at St. Louis and the revenue officer at Philadelphia ought to be considered by the Senator from Massachusetts before he passes a harsh judgment upon the President even upon those cases.

But this bill has very little relation to that particular subject. It goes into the whole matter and undertakes to regulate the exercise of this constitutional power on the part of the President from first to last. And now, without referring to the justice and right of the thing, I ask Senators if it is well, because there is a difference of opinion between the President and the Senate, that the Senate shall undertake to take from the President any power which the Constitution confers upon him? It is too late now to question the power of the President on the subject of removals from office. A uniform practice of so many years does not leave it an open question. It is a settled question, settled, I believe, by every department of the Government. It was settled, I think, by the legislative department at the first session of Congress. It has been settled by the uniform action of the executive department. I think it has been settled also by the judiciary, by the judgment of the Supreme Court upon a claim made by the judges in one of the Territories after they had been removed from office by the President. I have not had occasion to look to that case for some time, and I cannot give the particular facts; but my impression of the decision is that the Supreme Court decided that after removal by the President the parties were not in office and could not claim their salaries.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Allow me to ask the Senator if he refers to the case of the United States vs. Guthrie, in 17 Howard; the Minnesota case?

Mr. HENDRICKS. I refer to the case of the Minnesota judges.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In that case the court declined as a body to express any opinion on that point, and the only judge who did express an opinion upon it held exactly the reverse of what the Senator seems to suppose. The other judges declined to pass on the question at all, holding it in reserve, and turned the case on the question of the propriety of issuing a writ of mandamus to compel the payment of the money. So that as far as we can get any light from that decision that light is against the power of the President.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Did the case come from the court below?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, it was a proceeding in this District on a petition for a mandamus against the Secretary of the Treasury to compel the payment of salary.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I was not able to state the case exactly. The application was for the salaries of the removed territorial judges, and it resulted in their not getting their salaries.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, that is true.

Mr. HENDRICKS. And it resulted in the persons who were appointed in their places getting their salaries.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Not by force of the decision.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I thought it had been by a judgment of the court finally upon the point.

This power, then, of the President to remove and to appoint during the recess, in my judgment, has been settled too long to justify us in saying that it is an open question for any purpose. The power being possessed by the President, I submit whether Congress can restrict the President in the exercise of the power.

We may fix the tenures of offices unquestionably so far as they are under our control. To that part of the bill I should have no objection—a bill for that purpose, confined to that purpose; but a bill that takes away from the President what I think to be a power conferred upon him by the Constitution I cannot dream of supporting. Suppose, the question being an original one, we should say that the President does not have the power to remove, that he does not have the power to create a vacancy during the recess: I submit to the Senator from Vermont as a lawyer whether upon a constitutional question he allows no force precedent, to the uniform practice of the Government, whether after seventy odd years of usage upon this subject, after a very full expression of the legislative opinion upon the subject, it be now an open question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not make any extended answer to the question of my friend at this moment, but will only assure him that it is capable of demonstration, as he will discover presently, when we reach that question, that everything which has been done by way of practice, which is so much relied upon, has been done by express authority of law; and I have yet to learn that a practice may continue long enough under authority of law to preclude the law-making power from changing the law, and therefore changing the practice.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If the Senator refers to the Constitution as the law, I agree with him; but without reference to any particular power expressed in the law to remove an officer the President has exercised it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Every officer that has been removed, so far as my understanding goes, has been removed by force of the express authority conferred upon the President to do it. It may be true that the President may claim the exercise of that power independent of the law; but I take it, as long as the law-making power confer the authority upon him they are not to be concluded because he chooses to say that he has got the power without, because we are not committed as long as we authorize it to any construction he may put upon the Constitution himself.

Mr. HENDRICKS. What law does the Senator refer to?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I refer to any act under which any Department has been created or under which any officer has been appointed from the beginning of this Government down to this day; and I will produce the acts for the benefit of my friend when we reach the point of the debate where it properly belongs.

Mr. HENDRICKS. Upon the question of fact I do not agree with the Senator by any means; I do not admit that in all the laws of this country creating offices provision is made for the removal of the officer during the term. I think that is quite impossible. If it were just as stated by the Senator from Vermont I would concede that the power being exercised under express law, it would not be a precedent against Congress. That argument, upon the establishment of the fact which he supposes, I would concede; but the fact I do not concede, and he will have to refer to a good many laws I think to establish his proposition. In some few instances I dare say such a provision has been made.

But, Mr. President, going beyond that, are we not admonished by the suggestions of our wisest statesmen and by every important event in our political history of our duty to avoid a clash between the different departments of the Government? In ordinary and quiet times we do not fear that one department of the Government will attempt to invade the constitutional powers and jurisdiction of another; but in times such as the present the danger arises that one department will undertake to interfere with the exercise of the powers and the discharge of the duties of another department. The executive department cannot do very much in that respect. All that the executive department can do is to execute the laws. The judicial department cannot invade either of the other departments. But the legislative department originates law, makes law, subject only to the veto of the President; that is the department which is specially tempted in times of high party excitement to invade the provinces of the other departments. I submit to Senators that this time is not to last forever, the revolutionary sentiments of this day will pass away, and our country will be restored to quiet again, to harmony again, when all the people will sympathize in one common purpose to promote the interests of the country and of the Government, when all the States will be restored to their proper relations. Then I think Senators will regret that in a time of party excitement they allowed themselves to cast a vote or to make a speech in favor of a measure that invades the rightful constitutional province of another department of the Government.

Mr. CONNESS. Mr. President, it is a matter of regret to every sincere citizen that such a condition of relations should exist between the Executive and Congress as should call for such legislation as is now proposed in the Senate. I think that it can be said with entire truthfulness that the responsibility for such legislation does not lie at the doors of Congress. One short year ago there were no needs for such legislation; there was no exercise of the executive power demanding it at the hands of Congress; but in an evil moment, under as I believe bad auspices if not corrupted advice, the President of the United States permitted himself to receive the suggestions of men who could not rise above the position of partisans and whose highest aim was to build up a new political party in the United States. And singularly enough the chief engineers that took charge of the business of the construction of the new party had been prominent members of the then dominant party in the United States—the party that had led the country through four years of terrible war—the party that had under all circumstances stood firm and true to the flag and the national unity—the party that fought the open-handed rebels of the South and the “Sons of Liberty” organized as cowardly cabals in the free States of the North, and overcame them all.

Out of this party sprang the engineers of the new political combination. I trust that it will not be considered out of place if I deal a little candidly for the few moments I shall speak on the origin of this movement and the originators of it. How was it, sir? The Republican or Union party of the United States was considered as a tree in the forest that was the proper object of disposition by these persons. No less prominent a man in the country than the distinguished Secretary of State pointed a wedge at the trunk, while a great political leader from the State of New York took the maul to drive it in and rive the tree. And, sir, distinguished Senators that made themselves leaders, and whom it is unnecessary to mention here, undertook the lopping off of the branches and putting them into the market for immediate consumption. I think it ill becomes those gentlemen to come forward at this point of time, responsible as they are for all that has taken place, and complain that we stand here exercising the legitimate powers of this body to hinder their carrying out of this plan that they undertook.

The honorable Senator from Indiana remarked in the course of his speech that but a certain proportion of officers had been removed by the President by the advice of these bad advisers. I ask him how many would have been removed by their advice if the President would consent to the act, if the Senate had not been known to stand between the appointments and their confirmation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I cannot answer a question like that. I do not know whether the action of the Senate prevented any removals or not. The Senator can predicate whatever argument he pleases upon his proposition. I cannot answer a hypothetical case.

Mr. CONNESS. The honorable Senator understands as well as I do that the work would not have stopped with the number of four hundred, nor until it had reached the utmost bounds, but for the fact that the Senate had a say in the matter. The Senator tells us that they were entitled to a part. Who were entitled to a part? Not the party of which the honorable Senator is so distinguished a member, because I understood him to say that the effort of the President has been to confer these offices on men who were Republicans, not upon men who were Democrats, and that he has undertaken to do it only in less than the proportion of the number of votes that his supporters were shown to have polled in the last election, and he asks, Is it not fair that that shall be done?

Mr. President, no one knows better than the honorable Senator that political parties never play for a part; they play for the whole. The citizens in this country who were advised by the honorable Senator to hold the celebrated Philadelphia convention played for the whole, not for a part, and they lost the whole. They should be satisfied with the verdict and the result.

Mr. President, so far as my duty as a Senator is concerned in reviewing the President's nominations, when the time to exercise that duty shall come I am perfectly free to say that good nominations made by the President for apparent cause and for sufficient cause will receive at least my support in confirmation. It is not my design to oppose every nomination the President may see fit to have made or to make; but the President cannot expect, nor the Senator from Indiana, nor any Senator who has advised the decapitation of good men and the nomination in their place of men who only yesterday were opposed to the perpetuity of this Union, that such men shall be confirmed to those places.

The Senator has complained, and we have heard the complaint now I believe for the first time, that in the constitution of the committees of this body the Senate saw fit to exercise a discretion in the selection of the chairmen of the committees. It is not for me to make much reply to that part of the Senator's remarks. The question is well understood by the Senate; it is understood by the country. The gentlemen in question, as I before observed, played for all, and they lost all, and should be satisfied; and, sir, I have not heard from themselves that they are not satisfied. If the President has the right, if it is proper that he should surround himself by persons who sympathize with him and who represent or can represent his views, I apprehend that it will not be denied that it is any less right and proper on the part of the Senate to select its mouth-pieces in the prosecution of its business.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I did not refer to that as any criticism. I agree with the Senator; I have never found any fault with the majority of the Senate selecting the chairmen of committees. I have no objection to that; but I say that that is a specimen of proscription in the Senate which comes in strong contrast with the criticisms that are made by the majority party upon the President for doing a like thing. That was the use I made of it.

Mr. CONNESS. I have not used the word "proscription" myself. I do not think the construction of the committees of this body can be viewed in that light. I believe that one of the distinguished gentlemen to whom the Senator referred [Mr. COWAN] has only recently received the votes of the Opposition party in a neighboring State for the office of United States Senator, showing that the judgment of the Senate in regard to his political relations to the dominant party is not much out of the way.

I do not wish to pursue that branch of the subject; nor, indeed, do I wish to pursue this subject at all. It is evident from the direction the debate has taken the bill before the Senate has been lost sight of, and I am as anxious as any Senator to get to a vote upon the measure before us. Sir, it is not agreeable always (although it is in another sense quite agreeable to me always) to listen to the distinguished Senator from Indiana.

The astute manner of the Senator in endeavoring to seize all possible advantages for his political party out of questions as they arise in the Senate is, I think, pretty well understood. The Senator is of distinguished ability; he has exercised his ability in the Senate in the respect that I speak of, I think since he has been in it, the engineer of his party, the leader of his party, and recently having added to it a number in the Senate, he still keeps the lead. I do not know that a better one could be chosen.

But, Mr. President, I will not pursue this line of remark, nor waste the time of the Senate longer. What has taken place is well known and understood by the Senate and the country, and for one, as a member of the dominant party responsible for my part of their action, I feel entirely sinless in the premises.

Mr. McDOUGALL. Garments white as snow! I have said perhaps as much as I should say upon this bill, but I have not said all that is within my own mind as to the true policy with regard to the question of office, and the question of office being now depending I may as well say what I think, although I cannot speak exactly and am not prepared to put my thoughts in exact form of legislation.

It is my opinion that as a rule all offices outside of those strictly and properly executive, legislative, or judicial should be held during good behavior. If our officers in the city of Washington who take charge of our Government business here were not subject to be turned out any month or any day they would be able to begin in the public service young men, get trained to their duties, grow to be full-sized men, marry a wife, and raise children. As it is, all the employés of the Government in Washington are subject to be ejected at any moment. The policy that has obtained depraves the public officers here. The policy that obtains throughout the country with regard to postmasters and other officers depraves those men, because every one is anxious and in fear lest he may be ejected, and if the office he holds is a valuable one there are twenty persons about him watching to find some point of assault, some weak point in his armor where they think he may be successfully assaulted, so that the person assaulting him may take his position. It is the evil of our system, and it must be corrected. It is an evil that has been growing about us for years; and it is just as well that men who dare say these things should say them.

I undertake to say that we must change our whole system of appointments and the tenure of office. If the President, exercising his power, or one of his Secretaries exercising power in his place, appoints a person to office, he should hold the office as long as he conducts himself well in it. Until we can arrive at that so far as Washington is concerned, until we can arrive at that so far as the country generally is concerned, we shall fail in maintaining stability—standing firmly in our place. The greatest evil that exists in this Government is the multitude of offices and the multitude of aspirants; and it can only be corrected by having officers properly appointed, and then giving them a tenure of good behavior. If when a nomination was sent here we knew that the office was to be held during good behavior how careful would every Senator be in pronouncing whether or not he would confirm the individual, acting as a consulting and advising tribunal! How careful would the President be before he sent to the Senate the name of a man to hold a permanent office during good behavior! As it is now, it is a thing of a day, and they fall like autumnal leaves.

I repeat again what has been said by the wisest philosopher of our own period, that the evil of republican institutions is the multitude of offices and the multitude of aspirants. There is where our foundations are weak: there is where the surge is. If I were to produce my ideas in the form of legislation I would provide that, like an officer of the Army or a young man shipping in the Navy to become an officer, a clerk in the civil Departments should be entered properly, should go through his course of discipline, be educated to the profession, become a master of his profession, and then as long as he did his duty well I would let him hold the office. I would extend this principle through all the ramifications of the Government.

The present condition of things may be illustrated by reference to a county. I will take a county in the State of the Senator from New Jersey. That is as far off as I know, for I believe New Jersey was out of the Union not long since. [Laughter.] The county clerk is elected I suppose once in three or four years, and he is elected by a majority. When he comes into office it is as much as he can do to make his own sign-manual. He knows nothing of the forms of office. I take a supposable case, one which has happened undoubtedly. So of the sheriff of the county, and so of all the officers throughout our various manipulations of office in the United States.

Then consider that for every officer there are ten aspirants and you see at once our weakness. That is the evil which we must correct, and when that shall be accomplished it will be a greater reform than any subject of reform which has been thrust upon us by the Senator from Massachusetts, and a better reform for us and for the maintenance of republican institutions. Of course I would have the people elect the Legislature of the Federal Government and their own home Legislatures. The law-making power, the judicial power, and the executive power must have very immediate relations with the people; but in the common business of administration the offices should be continuous, so that we could have disciplined officers.

Go up to the Treasury Department now and you find that not one out of ten of the employés understands his business. Go to the Fifth Auditor's office, and you will find only one man in that office who knows anything about foreign coins, and he has to deal with the accounts of our consuls in different nations abroad and to make computations of the currency of different nations and States. Go about through the various Departments of the Government and you will find the same ignorance prevailing. Why is it? Because we do not train men to office.

Look at our foreign ministers. Our present minister to Russia is an excellent gentleman, for whom I have great respect. He may know a little Greek and Latin; but I do not think he knows anything about any modern language of the continent of Europe. I am very happy to say that I believe our present minister at the court of Versailles is a man who is an accomplished scholar. But with few exceptions those whom we send abroad go out uninstructed and know nothing about public law, the science that treats of inter-state relations and the relations of government. We have not at this present time more than three men in our service abroad who speak the language spoken in the country where they are; we have not more than three or four who ever studied public law and who could answer a question propounded by the pundits at St. Petersburg or at Vienna or at Berlin or at Florence! What is the reason? It is because of the want of discipline in office. I should like, in order to test the question whether the majority desire to see our Government conserved at all, to see some of the majority bring forward a measure providing that the mass of the officers now appointed for service, both at home and abroad, should have their offices during good behavior. I would advocate the extension of the term even of the executive and legislative departments of the Government.

This may not seem very democratic, and I have always been called a Democrat, and I think I am one; but I want to see this Government maintained upon some steady basis, and I think the evil of the multiplicity of offices as exhibited in recent years demands that we shall have continuous officers and fewer of them. Go into any of the Departments in Washington and you will find many of the clerks reading newspapers during business hours, or smoking cigars and enjoying themselves, if they happen to be in their offices at all. We have now employed at least three times as many clerks and other officials as could do the duty required if they worked as I did when I was a young man and was a clerk in a lawyer's office. The fact is; we are not now demanding faithful services, and this tendency to make offices that we may fill them ourselves is the cause of it. What do we see? "John, my boy, wants a place here." It is so from the police up to the clerks of the Secretary. "Then I must go and have an office made for him," if I happen to be in the majority, and go around and electioneer for him. In this way we have allowed ourselves to run wild, and we must apply a correction.

I have but little to say because I happen to be one of a very humble minority not able to affirm anything with any prospect of success, not able to maintain the truth, because the argument against the best truth I could advance would be that I had said it, and for that reason alone it would be ignored by many though not by all. But, sir, it is time that we should look these things boldly in the face; and if we do not look them boldly in the face now we shall feel the evil consequences of our neglect, we shall have failed to do something that has been charged upon us by our oath of office and by our obligations to the institutions given to us by our ancestors.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I agree with very much that has been said by the honorable Senator from California [Mr. McDUGALL] in relation to the tenure by which the executive offices of the Government are held. I had occasion to look into it when examining into the administration of Indian affairs in British America. I found that one of the great superiorities of the system of the British administration of Indian affairs grew out of the fact that the agents and employes of the Government connected with the administration of Indian affairs substantially held their places for life. A person would be employed at a small salary, but with the implied understanding that holding the office during good behavior, if he served the Government faithfully twenty or twenty-five years in this office, made it a life business, a profession, when he became old, he should not be thrust out impoverished to die, but should have a small pension upon which to retire. I attribute to a very great extent the superiority of the administration of Indian affairs in the British Provinces to that fact. I have no doubt that in all the Departments of the Government, if all the Departments were thoroughly organized upon a system by which competent young men should be introduced into the Departments at a small salary to begin with, not exceeding $600, $800, or $1,000 a year, gradually increasing the amount of compensation which they should receive in proportion to their term of service, with the understanding that they should hold these places during good behavior, it would do more than all other things to improve the administration of our affairs.

But, Mr. President, I do not intend to take up the time of the Senate in the discussion of this question. I am not prepared now to make a speech upon it, and I have no purpose to do so. I will simply make this remark, in reference to the change of men holding the offices of the Government: if the Executive for political reasons makes a change, you may say that the power can be abused; so, too, if the Senate for political reasons reject the confirmation, that power can be abused also. It is a power which can be abused by either department of the Government, either the executive or the Senate. We know what the history and practice of the Government has been; that as a general thing removals are made for political reasons, based upon political considerations, and in the midst of political conflicts gentlemen should have that regard for others to suppose that they have just as conscientious motives and patriotic motives to control their conduct as they claim for themselves.

As to what was said by the Senator from California [Mr. CONNESS] a short time ago in relation to the Philadelphia convention and the course pursued by certain gentlemen who had been identified with the Republican party during the great war through which we have passed, I have only to say that while the Senator from California may challenge for himself the purest and most patriotic motives, the motives of those gentlemen who had to do with that movement were as high and as pure as his. They claim that for themselves, they claim nothing more. In relation to the questions which were then pending I shall not enter into their discussion now. There will be other occasions more appropriate for their discussion; but when that discussion does come, I think I shall be prepared to show and to demonstrate to any man who will look upon the facts of history that the course pursued, so far as the policy of the Administration is concerned upon the subject of reconstruction, was precisely the policy which was adopted by President Lincoln, the policy which was adopted by the convention in 1864 which renominated him for the Presidency, the policy which from the beginning was the policy of the Republican party, but from which policy they have departed within the last eighteen months.

But, sir, I shall not go into the discussion of it now. I simply rose to say that while the Senator from California can ask for himself and challenge for himself the considerations which are due to just, patriotic motives on his part, other gentlemen have a right to ask the same consideration for the patriotism and purity of the motives which have controlled them in their course of action.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I rise for the single purpose now of reminding my colleague that before he commits himself absolutely and unequivocally to the task of demonstrating, so that any man can see it, that the policy to which the Philadelphia convention committed itself and undertook to commit the country was identical with the policy pursued by the late President and avowed by the convention which nominated that President, he ought to remember that he has been endeavoring, during the last campaign, to demonstrate that very fact, and that about two thirds of the American people were utterly unable to see it, and in view of his success on that occasion I think he ought not to undertake unequivocally to show it hereafter.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, when I enter upon the demonstration I hope that I shall be able to convince my colleague. I shall read his own speech on that subject, made not many months ago, and refer to his own votes in favor of that same policy.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, if my colleague will only confine himself to reading my speeches he will be able to demonstrate a good many things that he never has demonstrated yet; but he will utterly fail in the demonstration which he promises.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, I can only say that when the question of Arkansas was up not very long ago my colleague made a speech on that subject, which he has not answered and which has never been answered in this body, in which he demonstrated that the State of Arkansas was still a State of this Union, and that she had a right to choose Representatives. That is the speech to which I refer.

Mr. HOWE. Yes, Mr. President, I did make a speech on that occasion which I never have heard answered, and which I do not believe to-day can be answered, that under the law as it then stood the State of Arkansas had the right to send representatives here and a right which ought not by the Senate to be denied to her while the law stood as it did then on our statute-book. But in that speech I did insist that the State of Arkansas had forfeited that right, and that the two Houses ought to unite in declaring that forfeiture. At the very last session of Congress they did unite in declaring that forfeiture.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not understand that the two Houses of Congress have passed any law declaring that these States are out of the Union. The law stands precisely where it stood when my colleague made the speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. As the proposition on which the Senate is about to vote was brought forward by me I should like to have the indulgence of the Senate for a few minutes while I answer the objections that have been made to it. Had I succeeded in catching the eye of the Chair at the proper time I should perhaps have said something in reply to the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] but he has already been answered by the Senator from California, [Mr. CONNESS.] Besides, the topics which he introduced were, if I may so express myself, political in their character. He did not address himself directly to the proposition on which you are to vote. I do not say that his remarks were irrelevant; but obviously he seized the occasion to make a political speech. The Senator is an excellent debator; he always speaks to the point as he understands it; and yet his point is apt to be political. Of course he speaks as one having authority with his party, in which he is an acknowledged leader. And now, sir, you will please to remark, he comes forward as a leader for the President of the United States. The Senator from Indiana, an old-school Democrat—he will not deny the appellation—now presents himself as the defender of the President. Very well. I congratulate the President upon so able a defender. Before this great controversy is closed the President will need all the ability, all the experience, all the admirable powers of debate which belong to the distinguished Senator.

As I propose to call the attention of the Senate precisely to the question before us, I shall begin by asking the Secretary at the desk to read the amendments which I have offered.

The Secretary read the pending amendment, which was to insert as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That all officers or agents, except clerks of Departments, now appointed by the President or by the head of any Department, whose salary or compensation, derived from fees or otherwise, exceeds $1,000 annually, shall be nominated by the President and appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and the term of all such officers or agents who have been appointed since the 1st day of July, 1865, either by the President or by the head of a Department, without the advice and consent of the Senate, shall expire on the last day of February, 1867.

Mr. SUMNER. Now, Mr. President, I do not wish to be diverted from that plain proposition into any general discussion of a merely political character. I ask your attention to the simple question on which you are to vote.

And here I meet the objections which have been brought against my amendment, so far as I have been able to comprehend them. They have chiefly found a voice, unless I am much mistaken in the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] who is as earnest as he is unquestionably able. The Senator began with a warning, and his beginning gave a tone to all that he said. He warned us not to forget the lessons of the past; and he warned us also not to fall under the influence of any animosity. When he warned us not to forget the lessons of the past such was his earnestness that he seemed to me fresh from the study of Confucius. No learned Chinese, anxious that there should be no departure from the ancient ways and filled with devotion for distant progenitors, could have enjoined that duty more reverently. We were to follow what had been done in the past. Now, sir, I have a proper deference for the past; I recognize its lessons and seek to comprehend them; but I am not a Chinese to be swayed by any traditions. I break all bonds and wrappers when the occasion requires. I trust that the Senator from Maine will do so likewise. The occasion now is imperative, so that his lesson is entirely inapplicable. It is well to regard the Past, and study its teachings. It is well also to regard the Future, and seek to provide for its necessities. This is plain enough.

Then, sir, we are not to act under the influence of animosity. Excellent counsel; but pray what Senator on an occasion like this, when we strive to place in the statutes of the country an important land-mark, can allow himself to act under any such influence? Is the Senator from Maine the only one who can claim such immunity? I am sure he will not make any such exclusive claim: as he is conscious that he is free from this disturbing influence, so also am I. He is not more free from it than I am. Most precisely from my heart do I disclaim all animosity. I have nothing of the kind. I see nothing on this occasion but my duty.

And when I speak of my duty, I speak of what I would emphatically call the duty of the hour. I tried the other day in what passed between myself and the Senator from Maine somewhat to illustrate that idea. I said that we were not to act absolutely with reference to the past; nor absolutely with reference to the future, but we are to act in the present. Each hour has its duties and this hour has duties such as few other hours in our history have ever presented. Is there any one who can question it? Are we not in the midst of a crisis? It is sometimes said that we are in the midst of a revolution. Call it if you will simply a crisis. It is a critical hour, having its own peculiar responsibilities. Now, if you ask me, sir, in what the duty of the hour specially centers, on what the duty of the hour specially pivots, I have a very easy reply: it is in protection to the loyal and patriotic citizen, wherever he may be. I repeat it, protection to the loyal and patriotic citizen is the imminent duty of the hour. This duty is so commanding, so engrossing, so absorbing, so peculiar, let me say in one word, so sacred, that to neglect is like the neglect of every thing. It is nothing less than a general abdication.

Such, I say emphatically is the duty of the hour, in the presence of which it is vain for the Senator from Maine to cite the experience of other times when no such duty was urgent. He does not meet the case. What he says is irrelevant. All that was done in the past may have been well done. For it now I have no criticism; but at this hour it is absolutely inapplicable.

I return, then, to my proposition, that the duty of the hour is protection to the loyal and patriotic citizen. But when I have said this I have not completed my proposition. You may ask, protection against whom? I answer plainly, protection against the President of the United States. There, sir, is the duty of the hour. Ponder it well, and do not forget it. There was no such duty on our fathers; there was no such duty on our recent predecessors in this Chamber, because there was no President of the United States who had become the enemy of his country.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. I do not yield the floor.

Mr. McDUGALL. I rise to a question of privilege. I wish to ask—

Mr. SUMNER. I do not yield the floor.

Mr. McDUGALL. I do not ask you to yield the floor. I rise to a question which gives me a right to be heard—a question of privilege.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. ANTHONY in the chair.) The Senator from California rises to a question of privilege; he will state his question of privilege.

Mr. McDUGALL. It is that no Senator on this floor has a right to make use of such remarks of or about the Executive of the United States as those the Senator from Massachusetts has just uttered, when that Senator may be a judge upon a question of impeachment, if an impeachment should be preferred against the President. It has been held so always as the law of Parliament. It was the law of the Senate in its better days, always maintained by the gentleman from Vermont, now called to his long home, who for so many years graced the chair, [Mr. Foot.]

Mr. SUMNER. I rise to a point of order. The rule is explicit—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts rises to a question of order; he will state his point of order.

Mr. SUMNER. My point of order is this: the Senator undertook to interrupt me; I declined to yield the floor to him; and yet he proceeds to make a speech.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California rose to a question of privilege. The Chair understood him to object to words spoken in debate—

Mr. SUMNER. Let him take them down and present them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is his place to reduce the words to writing.

Mr. McDUGALL. I will do so.

The Senator proceeded to write upon a slip of paper the words of Mr. SUMNER to which he excepted; and having written them, handed the writing to a page to be submitted to Mr. SUMNER.

Mr. SUMNER declined to receive the paper, saying: I do not want it.

Mr. McDUGALL. I ask if I am correct in what I have there put down as the words used by the Senator?

Mr. SHERMAN and Mr. JOHNSON. Let the paper be read.

Mr. McDUGALL. I wanted to see if I was correct. [To Mr. SUMNER.] Are not the words I have written down the words you used?

Mr. SUMNER. If the Senator has any point of order to make let him make it; otherwise I must insist upon proceeding.

Mr. McDUGALL. I insist on my point of order, then. I say as a question of order as well as of privilege that it is not the privilege of a Senator, while on the floor of the Senate, unless the President is accused and being tried by this body as a high court—

Mr. SUMNER. I rise to a question of order. I insist upon proceeding unless the rules of the Senate are complied with.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California will send up a written statement of the words to which he excepts; and the question will be decided by the Chair. No debate is in order pending the decision, and after the decision is announced no debate on the question is in order unless an appeal be taken.

Mr. McDUGALL. I now send to the desk a statement of the words uttered by the Senator from Massachusetts, as I understood them.

The Secretary read the paper sent up by Mr. McDUGALL, as follows:

"We have never before had a President of the United States who was an enemy of his country."

Mr. McDUGALL. Those are the words I understood the Senator from Massachusetts to use.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is the impression of the Chair that those words do not exceed the usual latitude of debate which has been permitted here. Of course the Chair, as at present occupied, is very liable to error; and if the Senator objects to the ruling he can take an appeal.

Mr. McDUGALL. I do not desire to appeal from the decision of the Chair; but I think I must ask for a vote of the Senate on the question whether such language is parliamentary or not.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California appeals from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. McDUGALL. And I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state the question. The Senator from California has risen to a question of privilege, and objected that the words read at the desk are out of order. The Chair decides that the language is not out of order. The Senator from California appeals from the decision of the Chair, and asks for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SUMNER. I insist that the actual words I used shall be read by the short-hand writer.

Mr. McDUGALL. Very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will first ascertain whether the call for the yeas and nays is sustained.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SUMNER. I insist that the words which I used and which are objected to shall be taken from the notes of the short-hand reporter.

Mr. McDUGALL. I have no objection to that; the sense is the same.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the words objected to are clearly in order. I have heard similar remarks fifty times without any question of order being raised. I may say, when the tariff bill is up, that the Senator from California in taking a particular course is an enemy of the country. It is a common mode of argument, which has always passed unquestioned. We may express our opinion that an officer of the Government in doing so and so is an enemy of the country.

Mr. McDUGALL. Mr. President—

Mr. SUMNER. I rise to a question of order. I wish to proceed with my remarks.

Mr. McDUGALL. I have the floor. The Senator from Ohio would be right if the person addressed was a member upon this floor; but he not being on this floor, the Senator from Massachusetts has no more right to use such language than he would if he were in the Supreme Court.

Mr. SUMNER. I raise the point of order that debate is not in order now. The Senator is insisting upon debate.

Mr. JOHNSON. There is an appeal from the decision of the Chair. Debate is in order upon the appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The appeal is debatable.

Mr. McDUGALL. I have the floor then on the appeal. If a rude remark or an accusation like that were made against a Senator it would be a grave offense and would deserve the condemnation of the Senate unless there was good cause why. But it is not within the courtesy of the Senate to assault a person not present on the floor who cannot defend himself. To assault here a judge of the Supreme Court on the bench would be a violation of parliamentary rules. If the Senator from Ohio should go into the Supreme Court to-morrow morning and should say a rude thing of the President of the Senate, he would be immediately told by the presiding justice to take his seat. It is not within the courtesy and the law that a person absent, belonging to an independent branch of Government, should be assaulted by being accused of being an enemy of his country. Why? Because it is accusation of treason, if you please, substantially. When that question shall come here and the Senator from Massachusetts shall be its champion, it being brought up here by its promoters from the House of Representatives, then he may discuss it as carefully and well as he can as a member of the high court of impeachment, if he chooses to be one of the impeaching parties. Otherwise, it is not within the license of a Senator to say of the President things of that kind that involve his integrity as a public officer.

Sir, there have been times in the better days of the Republic when such things would not be listened to, would not be heard on this Senate floor or in the House of Representatives; and when, if any person should have said that of a Senator, whether he agreed or differed with him in politics, to the President of the United States, he would have shown him the way to the door and asked him to absent himself. In our Supreme Court the rule has always been so. It has been witnessed by every Senator who has had anything to do with judicial tribunals, both in the States and in the Federal Government. It has been done here. The gentleman who presided over our councils here for many years, and who honored our body by being a member of it from Vermont, never permitted words of that kind to be said of any department of the Government that were not here to respond for themselves.

If I am accused of treason or treachery or being an enemy of my country, I being here it is assumed that at least I have a chance to defend myself; but the absent may have no defenders.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. McDougall. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. This is a very important question, and I am rather inclined to agree in opinion with the Senator from California; that the words spoken exceeded the proper limit of debate, but I am not certain about it. I suggest the propriety of this question of order being adjourned until to-morrow, and that we proceed with the consideration of the bill, so that we may have time to look into the precedents.

Mr. McDougall. I should like to have the question determined by the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to postpone the further consideration of this question of order until to-morrow.

Mr. HOWARD. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

Mr. SUMNER. That cannot be done.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The appeal cannot be withdrawn except by the unanimous consent of the Senate, the yeas and nays having been ordered upon it.

Mr. McDougall. The question of the appeal may be postponed, and the debate may go on on the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My motion was, the Senator from California yielding the floor for that purpose, to adjourn this question of order until to-morrow and to proceed with the bill. That motion I believe to be perfectly in order.

Mr. GRIMES. I hope that will not be done. I think it is due to the Senator from Massachusetts that this question should be settled. He is charged with having given utterance to a sentiment here which the reporter's notes do not bear out. The appeal should be changed by the Senator from California so as to correspond with the official report, and then let us settle this question and let the Senator go on.

Mr. JOHNSON. What are the words?

Mr. McDougall. I wrote them as I heard them.

Mr. GRIMES. The words used by the Senator from Massachusetts were, we have never had a President of the United States who was an enemy of his country.

Mr. McDougall. "Until this."

Mr. GRIMES. No, sir. The words attributed to him by the Senator from California were, "We have never before had a President of the United States who was an enemy of his country," making a very material difference.

Mr. JOHNSON. Do you speak now from the report?

Mr. GRIMES. Yes, sir, from the report by the reporter.

Mr. McDougall. If the Senator will allow me, I wish to make an inquiry of the Senator from Massachusetts. I put down his language as I heard him deliver it. I wish to ask him whether he denies the affirmation?

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator has not quoted my language correctly. Of course he has not quoted it correctly.

Mr. McDougall. Very well. I designed quoting it correctly, and I have a very bad pair of ears and a very short memory if I have not done it.

Mr. JOHNSON. The decorum which the Senator from Massachusetts almost always observes, and which is so necessary to the success of our own deliberations and the character of the body, satisfies me that he could not have intended to apply the remark, whatever he may think, in the sense in which it was understood by the Senator from California. I do not know that my friend from Massachusetts has before him, as he sometimes has, in writing what he stated to the Senate; but if he has not, my own experience, and what I am sure will be admitted to be the experience of every member of the body is, that our reporters are accurate to a letter. I have no doubt, therefore, that if my friend from Iowa is correct in saying what the reporters have stated to have been the remark it is not out of order. It does not imply that the incumbent of the presidential office is or has been an enemy to his country. It is—

Mr. HOWARD. If the Senator from Maryland will allow me a moment—

Mr. JOHNSON. With pleasure.

Mr. HOWARD. I wish to inquire whether this debate is in order. I made a motion to lay the appeal on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair did not hear the motion.

Mr. JOHNSON. I did not hear it either. I think if the honorable Senator from Michigan will permit me to go on I shall not say anything that he will find fault with. There is nothing—

Mr. McDougall. If the Senator from Maryland will allow me one moment. Upon the statement of the Senator from Massachusetts, if he will affirm that the language expressed by him is that just stated I will withdraw the appeal.

Mr. JOHNSON. Very well; then I have nothing further to say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It can only be withdrawn by unanimous consent, the yeas and nays having been ordered. Is there any objection?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. As some question has arisen—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator object to the withdrawal of the appeal?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I object until I make my statement. I say some question has arisen as to the precise language which was used by the Senator from Massachusetts—

Mr. SUMNER. I will read it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understand the Senator proposes to read his precise language, so that there will be no doubt as to what were the precise words which were used by him, and then of course we shall be better prepared to judge whether they are in or out of order.

Mr. McDougall. I have withdrawn the appeal.

Mr. HOWARD. If the appeal is withdrawn, of course the Senator from Massachusetts will proceed with his remarks.

Mr. SUMNER. Have I the floor?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands there is no objection to the withdrawal of the appeal. It is withdrawn. The Senator from Massachusetts is recognized as entitled to the floor.

Mr. SUMNER. When I was interrupted in the extraordinary way which the Senate has witnessed a few moments ago, I was trying to present reasons in favor of the proposition on which we are to vote, and I had insisted as strongly as I could that the special duty of the hour was protection to loyal and patriotic citizens against the President of the United States; and in that connection I undertook to reply to something that fell from the Senator from Maine, who does not enter into this consideration; who seems, if I may judge from his argument, to feel that there is no occasion for any special safeguards at this hour; and while presenting that view I used language which, according to the short-hand reporter, was as follows. He has kindly written it out and sent it to me. I read it from his notes:

"There, sir, is the duty of the hour. There was no such duty on our fathers; there was no such duty on our recent predecessors, because there was no President of the United States who had become the enemy of his country."

Such were the words which I used when suddenly interrupted. By those words, sir, I stand.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I raise a question of order, whether these words are in order, as stated by the Senator?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has already decided a similar point of order. The Chair will submit this question to the Senate.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no; decide it.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Very well; let it be submitted to the Senate, and let the sense of the Senate be taken as to whether these words are in order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the opinion of the Chair the words referred to do not exceed the latitude of debate that has been usual here. That has already been decided on these precise words. Does the Senator from Wisconsin appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I understood the Chair to state that he would take the sense of the Senate on the question, and on the question of submitting it to the Senate I desire to make a single observation.

Mr. SUMNER. I rise to a question of order. I insist upon proceeding in order unless there is some further motion pending before the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin rose to a point of order.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well; he has been overruled.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair proposed to submit the point to the decision of the Senate; but several Senators calling upon the Chair to decide the point of order, the Chair decided that the words referred to were not out of order. Does the Senator from Wisconsin appeal from the decision of the Chair?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Mr. President, as this precise question is one of very great importance, inasmuch as discussions are continually arising and observations are being made in relation to the executive department of the Government, I think it should be passed upon dispassionately and considerably, and in order to give us an opportunity to do so I move that the Senate do now adjourn. ["Oh, no."]

The question being put; there were on a division—yeas 9, noes 24.

Mr. McDougall. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion to adjourn.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. LANE. I move to lay the appeal from the decision of the Chair upon the table, and on that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor, and the Senator from Indiana cannot take the floor from him to make the motion without his consent.

Mr. LANE. I supposed the Senator was through.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Wisconsin must have yielded the floor because the question has been put to adjourn.

Mr. SUMNER. He lost the floor by allowing another motion to intervene.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was in error. The motion of the Senator from Indiana is in order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. On the question of moving to lay on the table an appeal on a question of order, I submit whether the Senator from Indiana is in order in moving to lay the appeal on the table?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Indiana is in order in the judgment of the Chair.

Mr. LANE. It is the only possible and proper motion to suit such a case as this, in my opinion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is a motion which is made in reference to a great many things.

Mr. SUMNER. I call the Senator to order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I rise to a question of order, whether a motion to lay the appeal on the table is in order?

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Chair has overruled that point.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not understand the Chair to have made any announcement on the subject.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the judgment of the Chair the motion is in order. The Chair is not aware of any exceptions to this motion.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I will appeal, then, from that decision.

Mr. LANE. You cannot pile up two appeals, one upon the other. The first question of order must be decided, and then an appeal may arise; but you cannot pile up one appeal on another. If so, the process will be interminable and we shall reach no result.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I call the honorable Senator from Indiana to order. I had the floor on an appeal from the decision of the Chair, and having the floor I did not yield to the Senator from Indiana for any such purpose. Now, I insist that where an appeal is taken from a decision of the Chair on a question of order, and the question of order is thus brought before the Senate, if a motion to lay the appeal on the table can be entertained, it is utterly impossible to get the judgment of the Senate upon the question of order; it is disposed of, of necessity, without debate; whereas an appeal from the decision of the Chair is always a matter for discussion, so that the Senate can pass considerably upon the question of order; and questions of order are sometimes the most important questions which can be submitted to the Senate. The objection which is made that I am piling appeal upon appeal—

Mr. SUMNER. I rise to a question of order. I insist that all that the Senator from Wisconsin is now interjecting into this debate is out of order. There is a motion of the Senator from Indiana to lay the appeal on the table. You cannot pile another appeal upon the first appeal. The vote must be taken.

Mr. COWAN. The motion of the Senator from Indiana to lay the appeal on the table is not an appeal.

Mr. SUMNER. But there is an appeal, which he moves to lay on the table.

Mr. COWAN. I so understand it; but that is not an appeal from the decision of the Chair. I understand the Chair to decide that the motion of the Senator from Indiana is in order. Then there is only one appeal. My honorable friend from Wisconsin has a right to his appeal, and that is the only one.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the judgment of the Chair the Senator from Wisconsin is in order.

Mr. SUMNER. Very well.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I was saying that I do not see how it is possible on a question of order to obtain the judgment of the Senate upon a consideration if a Senator can rise and at once move to lay it upon the table.

Mr. GRIMES. That is the very purpose, because the Senate is not prepared to express any judgment; to lay it over or lay it on the table for consideration at another day.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. But what is to be done with the Senator when, under the rule of the Senate, if he be not in order he cannot proceed at all? How are we to dispose of him?

Mr. FESSENDEN. For the sake of testing this matter I desire to appeal from the last decision of the Chair, that the Senator from Wisconsin was in order. That will make only three appeals pending at the same time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. There is only one question of appeal pending. There is a motion of the Senator from Indiana to lay an appeal on the table. The Chair decides that that motion of the Senator from Indiana is in order. From that decision the Senator from Wisconsin appeals.

Mr. FESSENDEN. And then the question is raised by the Senator from Massachusetts whether the Senator from Wisconsin is in order. The Chair decides that he is. From that decision I appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair thinks he is in order.

Mr. WADE. And I move to lay this last appeal on the table. [Laughter.] I want to see how we shall come out.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The appeal of the Senator from Maine is an appeal over an appeal.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mine was the third. There were two previous appeals.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The same objection which was made to the motion of the Senator from Indiana applies to the motion of the Senator from Ohio. If an appeal can be laid upon the table and the question of order disposed of in that way, and without debate, it is impossible to get the judgment of the Senate upon the question; whereas we know that questions upon appeals are always open to debate in order that the judgment of the Senate may be had. I simply desire that the judgment of the Senate shall be pronounced upon this question as to whether the use of such words is allowable. Suppose we were to speak of the Congress or the House of Representatives—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The gentleman from Wisconsin is not in order in discussing any question except the appeal.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. That is just the point I was intending to present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The other point is not in order.

Mr. McDUGALL. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. McDUGALL. I wish to ask him a question for information. I understood that he had not yielded the floor when the Senator from Indiana rose and made the motion to lay on the table, but still claimed the floor.

Mr. LANE. That is an entire mistake. The Senator from Wisconsin had made a motion to adjourn, and that motion being put, of course he lost the floor, and then I was properly on the floor, and the motion was in order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I was still entitled to the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. With pleasure.

Mr. SHERMAN. I merely rise to say a word on this point of order, because we do not wish to be involved in alterations of this kind here. The manual and rule of parliamentary law both of the House of Representatives and the British Parliament is, that whenever a motion is made that is not debatable you cannot accumulate questions upon it. Therefore, when a motion is made to adjourn, you cannot take an appeal from the decision of the Chair on the adjournment and debate that; and when a motion is made to lay a question on the table, the most ordinary form of parliamentary motion, there can be no debate after that motion is made until the motion is determined. Therefore, in my opinion, with due deference to the decision of the Chair, when the Senator from Indiana makes a motion to lay the appeal on the table, that is the end of all debate, and that motion must be put, and no other motion or business can intervene except a motion to adjourn. That being a motion of a prior and higher order, supercedes the motion to lay on the table. That is the parliamentary rule. I trust, therefore, that we shall go back and commence at the beginning of this difficulty and take the question, without debate, upon the motion of the Senator from Indiana. That is the parliamentary rule.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. In reply to the Senator from Ohio I have simply to say that one of two things is certain: we must either dispose of and settle the question of order in the midst of the debate, for it has reference to the debate and the Senator upon the floor; we must dispose of that question now, or if a motion to lay that question on the table can intervene, it carries the debate with it and the subject-matter of the debate.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator from Indiana moves to lay the question upon the table. What question is that? Simply the appeal. The point of order can come up again to-morrow or any day, at any moment. The Senator from Wisconsin may call up that question which was laid upon the table, and we can consider it then. That is the custom of the Senate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Let us see where we stand, and not be misled by the very astute argument of my learned friend from Ohio. A Senator is upon the floor, making use of language alleged to be out of order. He is called to order because the words are out of order. An appeal is taken from the decision of the Chair on the question of order. A motion is made to lay that appeal on the table. What effect has that motion upon the Senator on the floor in debate? Is he allowed to go on?

Mr. SHERMAN. The parliamentary law says expressly that upon any disposition made of the point of order the Senator may proceed according to the judgment of the Senate; and that is the language used in the rule.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Then, according to the Senator from Ohio, the judgment of the Senate can be taken without debate on a question of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. The judgment of the Senate may be taken without debate on a question to lay a proposition on the table. It is simply to lay it aside for the present. Then the ordinary motion is that the Senator be allowed to proceed in order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. What I desire is, to get the judgment of the Senate—and I want the deliberate judgment of the Senate—on the question whether the use of these words is parliamentary. I do not care whether it is decided just at this moment or decided an hour hence or decided to-morrow; but the question ought to be passed upon, so that we may know whether such words are or are not within the rules of parliamentary proceedings; whether it is parliamentary for a Senator speaking of the Supreme Court of the United States to say that the Supreme Court of the United States is the enemy of the country; whether it is parliamentary for a Senator to say that the House of Representatives is the enemy of the country; whether it is parliamentary for us to say of the President of the United States that he is the enemy of the country; whether it is parliamentary for us to say of each other on this floor that we are the enemies of the country.

Mr. FESSENDEN. No; that would not be in order.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. My friend suggests that we cannot say on this floor to each other that we are the enemies of the country. Why not? If it be not in order for one Senator to say to another Senator that he is the enemy of the country, what is the reason that it is out of order? It is because you are not using proper and parliamentary language toward an officer of the Government who is entitled to be treated with ordinary respect.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Because it tends to promote disorder in the body.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. It is suggested because it tends to promote disorder in the body. But, sir, is there not a still greater tendency to promote disorder and confusion in the country if one branch of the Government is to denounce another branch of the Government as an enemy of the country; for the Senate to denounce the House of Representatives as an enemy to the country; for us to denounce the President as an enemy of the country? That is the question. I wish to have the judgment of the Senate upon that question. I do not care how it is arrived at. Forms are nothing to me; substance is all at which I aim. I believe that according to parliamentary law it is not even parliamentary for any person in debate on this floor to say of a pending measure that should it pass the President would veto it, or would probably veto it. It is not within the rule of parliamentary law for us to speak of the proceedings of the House of Representatives in any way disrespectful, or in any way whatever, or of the proceedings of a committee. All I ask is, that I may understand the judgment of the Senate on this question. I care not as to the form of arriving at it. I have great respect for the decisions of the Chair always, and it was simply with a view of getting the judgment of the Senate on this question that I took the appeal, and I wish that the person occupying the Chair had taken the sense of the Senate directly upon the question as to whether the use of these words was in order.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is satisfied, upon an examination of the authorities, that the former decision made by him in regard to the appeal taken by the Senator from Wisconsin was not correct, and that no debatable motion can intervene after a motion to lay upon the table. Such is the judgment of the Chair after an examination of the authorities.

MR. DOOLITTLE. Having made the appeal for the purpose of making my statement, I will now withdraw it. What I desire is—

MR. SUMNER. I rise to a question of order; the Senator from Wisconsin is not in order.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to lay the appeal on the table.

MR. SUMNER. And that is not debatable.

MR. DOOLITTLE. If it is decided that that is not debatable I will withdraw my appeal.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. It is moved that the appeal taken by the Senator from California [Mr. McDougall] from the judgment of the Chair be laid upon the table.

MR. DOOLITTLE. I withdraw my appeal from the decision on the motion of the Senator from Indiana, the Chair having stated that on examination he found the authorities the other way.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to lay on the table the appeal taken by the Senator from California, and that motion is not debatable.

MR. McDOUGALL. I withdrew my appeal by unanimous consent.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California asks leave to withdraw the appeal by unanimous consent.

MR. McDOUGALL. It was withdrawn, and then renewed by the Senator from Wisconsin.

MR. LANE. It was the appeal of the Senator from Wisconsin which I moved to lay upon the table, and there the debate should have ended, and the vote should have been taken.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands it was renewed by the Senator from California. ["No!" "No!"]

MR. McDOUGALL. I withdrew it by unanimous consent.

MR. SUMNER. The appeal is by the Senator from Wisconsin.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The appeal is by the Senator from Wisconsin, and the question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to lay that appeal on the table.

MR. CONNESS. And upon that question the yeas and nays were called for by the Senator who made the motion.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. They were called for, but not ordered. On this question the yeas and nays are demanded.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Hendricks, Johnson, McDougall, Norton, Patterson, and Saulsbury—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, (presiding), Creswell, Davis, Foster, Guthrie, Nesmith, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Sumner, and Trumbull—13.

So the appeal from the decision of the Chair was laid upon the table.

MR. FESSENDEN. With the leave of the Senator from Massachusetts, I understand from him that he is not particularly desirous of closing his remarks to-night, and it is quite evident that we cannot get through with the bill to-night. Cold as this room is and uncomfortable as it is, I would be willing to stay here if we could finish the debate to-night, but it is quite evident that we cannot do it. I rise, therefore, for the purpose of moving an adjournment. If my friend from Vermont has anything to say I will withdraw the motion.

MR. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say this: it is quite obvious to me that we shall be just as far off to-morrow morning as we were this in reaching the end of this question, unless we determine to go on with it. Of course if it is the pleasure of the Senate to adjourn they will do so. It is their pleasure not mine that will control that question.

MR. FESSENDEN. I will withdraw the motion if my friend desires me to do so.

MR. EDMUNDS. I certainly desire it to be withdrawn.

Several SENATORS. Let us adjourn.

MR. FESSENDEN. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, January 17, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. E. P. MARVIN, D. D., of Boston.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

HARBOR AT POINT SAL.

MR. McRUER, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce be instructed to inquire into the existence of a harbor in the vicinity of Point Sal, on the coast of California, the practicability of rendering such harbor available for the purpose of commerce, and what expenditure is necessary therefor.

COLONEL L. C. HOUK.

MR. STOKES, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Colonel L. C. Houk, of Tennessee; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

JAMES M. LATTA.

MR. DEFREES, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of James M. Latta; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

PAVING OF PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

MR. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be hereby instructed to inquire into the expediency of paving Pennsylvania avenue, or any part thereof, and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

WILLIAM B. TODD.

MR. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of William B. Todd; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

FRAUDS ON THE GOVERNMENT.

MR. COOK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to enable the United States to recover the value of property of which it has been defrauded; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

MR. STEVENS. I now call for the regular order of business.

The House resumed, as the regular order of business, the consideration of the bill reported last evening from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with sundry amendments, being House bill No. 896, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

MR. STEVENS. I was somewhat surprised, sir, to read in the papers of this morning that the call for a division on the last amendment pending in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union last evening had been withdrawn. It is entirely untrue. I called for and insisted upon a division, and I left the House knowing that there was not the third of a quorum here. I cannot understand how the amendment can have been reported to the House as having been adopted by the committee. If the Journal so reports, I beg to have the Journal corrected, if there be any Journal, and I do not know that there is in Committee of the Whole.

THE SPEAKER. There is no Journal in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. The chairman of that committee reported the bill with various amendments.

MR. STEVENS. Can that include an amendment which was not adopted at all by the committee? I am ready to assert that the last amendment pending was not adopted, and therefore it could not be reported.

MR. BLAINE. Then I would ask if it was not equally incompetent for the chairman to report the bill if that amendment was still pending?

THE SPEAKER. The chairman of the committee decided that the amendment was agreed to, and it is not within the province of the Speaker to rule in regard to what occurred in Committee of the Whole. All that takes place in Committee of the Whole is subject to revision in the House, and that is the reason why no Journal is kept in Committee of the Whole.

MR. STEVENS. I am very unwilling to have the record left in the condition in which it now is, for it is wholly untrue in the respect I have indicated.

MR. FARNSWORTH. I have quite a distinct recollection how this matter occurred. Before the Committee of the Whole rose last evening the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] called for a division upon an amendment which was then pending, and he insisted upon the division. I myself, with other gentlemen here, appealed to the gentleman to withdraw his call for a division, let the amendment be regarded as adopted, and then the bill could be reported to the House. But the gentleman did not withdraw his call for a division, but persisted in it, and therefore after the committee rose and the chairman of the Committee of the Whole had made his report, the Speaker will recollect that I made the point of order that the report was not strictly correct, as there was an amendment offered to the bill in Committee of the Whole which had not been acted on. But the Speaker decided that he had no right to go behind the report of the chairman of the Committee of the Whole.

THE SPEAKER. The Chair understands that there was no division upon the motion to report the bill with amendments from the Committee of the Whole. The Chair supposes that the chairman of the Committee of the Whole did not understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania as persisting in his demand for a division.

MR. STEVENS. I over and over again declared that I would not withdraw the call for a division.

THE SPEAKER. It is not within the power of the Speaker to rule upon the subject. The gentleman can move to recommit the bill, with amendments, to the Committee of the Whole.

MR. STEVENS. I desired to make the statements I have made in order that what I may say hereafter upon the subject will not be misunderstood. I do not know but what it would take longer to go into Committee of the Whole than to dispose of it in the House. Therefore perhaps we had better go on with the bill in the House.

THE SPEAKER. The gentleman can make a motion to recommit the bill, with amendments, to the Committee of the Whole, or the gentleman can ask for a separate vote upon the amendment in the House.

MR. STEVENS. Very well; I will move to recommit the bill and pending amendments to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of correcting an amendment that was made on page 8 of the bill, in relation to contingent expenses of the House of Representatives. I therefore move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. COBB in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill No. 896, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

Mr. STEVENS. I now ask that unanimous consent be given to restore the clause in relation to laborers for the House of Representatives to what it was when originally reported, so that it will read as follows:

For laborers, $12,693.

No objection was made, and the clause was restored to its original form.

Mr. STEVENS. I now move to amend the clause so that it will read:

For laborers, $12,893.

For additional compensation to Louis Saunders, in charge of House water-closets, $109; and for deficiency due him for the current fiscal year, $100.

Mr. FINCK. I rise to a point of order. I ask whether it is in order for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to move to strike out an amendment inserted by the Committee of the Whole without first reconsidering the vote by which it was adopted?

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. COBB in the chair.) The motion to restore the clause to its original form was made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and agreed to by unanimous consent; that left the clause open to amendment as before. The Chair is further advised that in Committee of the Whole the motion to reconsider is not in order.

Mr. FINCK. I understand the amendment was made in Committee of the Whole.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment was stricken out by unanimous consent.

Mr. FINCK. I did not understand the question.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the amendment to be in order.

The amendment was then agreed to.

Mr. STEVENS. I now renew an amendment which I withdrew last evening, adding a new section. I have altered it so as to make it apply to the Court of Claims alone, and I understand there will now be no objection to it. I move to add the following new section:

And be it further enacted, That the proviso contained in the third section of chapter two hundred and ten of the act of July 2, 1864, shall be construed to embrace all suits to which the United States shall be a party in the Court of Claims, either as plaintiff or defendant.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Before I agree to that I want some explanation of it. I want to know what that act is.

Mr. STEVENS. That act, which was passed in 1864, provides that in the courts of the United States there shall be no exclusion of any witness on account of color, and that in civil actions parties in interest may testify. It was supposed, and I suppose now, that that provision was broad enough to include all cases in which the United States was a party in any court; but inasmuch as the Court of Claims is not mentioned, that court has decided that this provision does not apply to suits pending in that court; that the old law with regard to exclusion still exists. The object of this amendment is to put suits in the Court of Claims on precisely the same footing as suits in the United States district courts.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The proposition now offered has no business in an appropriation bill.

Mr. STEVENS. The original provision was contained in an appropriation bill.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Well, it had no business there. I object to this amendment. I do not wish to give the Court of Claims any further jurisdiction. I object to the passage of any law under which parties may go into that court and swear their claims through. I raise the point of order that this amendment proposes independent legislation on an appropriation bill, and it is flagrantly out of order under the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair decides that under the usage of this House the amendment is in order. Although as an original question the Chair would be inclined to regard this amendment as inadmissible, yet long usage has settled the practice in favor of the reception of such propositions.

Mr. STEVENS. The appropriation bill of 1864 contained the provision to which I have referred. This is merely a declaration as to the meaning of that law—nothing else.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. It is an alteration of existing law; and it is general legislation in an appropriation bill. To my mind it is clearly out of order.

Mr. STEVENS. The appropriation bill of 1864 contained a provision—

"That in the courts of the United States there shall be no exclusion of any witness on account of color, nor in civil actions because he is a party to or interested in the issue tried."

This amendment is a mere construction of that law, declaring that it applies to the Court of Claims as one of the courts of the United States.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I have objected to the admission of this amendment. The committee cannot go back except by unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that this amendment is offered to come in at the end of the bill.

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

Mr. JENCKES. If I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania, this amendment is restricted in its operation to cases in the Court of Claims.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JENCKES. It goes no farther?

Mr. STEVENS. No farther.

Mr. HALE. Do I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say that since the passage of the civil rights bill the Court of Claims has decided that negro testimony cannot be received in that court?

Mr. STEVENS. They have decided within a few days that the provision which I have quoted does not apply to that court.

On the amendment of Mr. STEVENS there were—ayes 52; noes 25; no quorum voting.

The CHAIRMAN, under the rule, ordered tellers; and appointed Mr. STEVENS and Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 73; noes 25.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I desire to ask the unanimous consent of the committee to a modification of an amendment adopted yesterday: The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARDING] with regard to employing in the police force of this city those who have served as soldiers of the United States does not embrace those who have been in the naval service. There are now in the police force some who have served as sailors. I ask unanimous consent that the amendment be modified by inserting "seamen and marines."

The CHAIRMAN. If there is no objection the amendment will be so modified.

There was no objection.

Mr. RAYMOND. Allow me to ask a question. I desire to know whether the following paragraph has been acted on:

For facilitating communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States by electrical telegraph, $40,000.

Mr. STEVENS. It has been acted on; but there is to be a vote in the House, and the gentleman may call for the yeas and nays if he chooses.

Mr. BIDWELL. I ask unanimous consent that we may go back and consider the following paragraph which was stricken out:

For continuing the collection of reliable statistical information concerning the gold and silver mines of the western States and Territories, which shall include the labor and capital employed, the product and the modes of working the same, which information shall be reported to Congress, $10,000.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

Mr. STEVENS. I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. COBB reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill No. 896, making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867, had directed him to report the same back to the House with sundry amendments.

Mr. STEVENS. Before demanding the previous question I beg leave to renew an amendment rejected in Committee of the Whole. I understand some gentlemen who objected then are now in favor of the proposition. I again move the following amendment: to strike out these words—

For salary of the reporter of the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States, $2,500.

And to insert in lieu thereof the following:

For salary of the reporter of the Supreme Court of the United States, $2,500, if one volume only of the reports is published as heretofore; and in case the Supreme Court should direct him to publish two volumes, then the sum of $2,500 for each volume so published.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. That amendment has already been rejected.

Mr. STEVENS. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I object.

Mr. THAYER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to submit the amendment in the House; and if the gentleman from Illinois will permit me I will make a short explanation. If he will hear me I am sure he will not insist on his objection. If it had been understood by the committee yesterday it would not have been voted down. It has always been customary.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I insist on my objection. I do not object to the gentleman from Pennsylvania making an explanation until the House adjourns, but I insist on reserving all my objections.

The SPEAKER. The amendment is not before the House.

Mr. THAYER. Allow the House at least to vote upon it with some explanation on the subject. I am sure the gentleman would not do this gentleman an injustice.

Mr. BIDWELL. I desire to know whether it is in order to ask for a separate vote on the amendment.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BIDWELL. Then I ask for a separate vote on the amendment in reference to mining statistics.

Mr. THAYER. I rise to a point of order. Is it not competent for the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to move an amendment?

The SPEAKER. Any amendment appropriating money must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. This appropriates $2,500 under certain contingencies which have not been fully considered in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. THAYER. Two thousand five hundred dollars have been appropriated; and the proposition is to double the appropriation in consideration of the reporter being obliged to issue an additional volume, three hundred copies of which he has to give to the Interior Department at his own expense. Now, is it not competent for the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations to move to amend the bill at this stage by striking out "two thousand five hundred dollars" and inserting "five thousand dollars?"

The SPEAKER. It is not; that would be a very good argument in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. THAYER. I am not making an argument, but a point of order. I inquire whether it is not competent for the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, after the bill is reported to the House, to move an amendment to his own bill increasing the appropriation?

The SPEAKER. It is no more in order for the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations than for any other member of the House to move the amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. Better let it go to the Senate.

Mr. THAYER. Very well.

Mr. STEVENS. Before I call the previous question I have a single word to say in regard to what is reported as the last amendment. I beg it may be read.

The Clerk read the amendment as follows:

And be it further enacted, That to enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay the increased compensation voted by the House during the Thirty-Ninth Congress to its employés, clerks, and others, and to pay the increased rate of compensation thereby authorized, a sum sufficient therefor is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. STEVENS. Now I deny that that was ever reported by the Committee of the Whole; therefore I think it ought not to be adopted. I have no objection to paying these clerks any reasonable amount that anybody will bring in a bill for, but it is proper for me to say that there is a great inequality in the compensation of the different classes of clerks. Some of them receive fifty, some sixty, and some eighty per cent. more than another large class of them. Now I am willing, if a bill is brought in equalizing the compensation of these clerks, to make an appropriation putting them on the same footing; but while this difference in their relative compensation exists this amendment is unjust and ought not to be made. I again say that if a bill is presented giving any reasonable amount of compensation, but equalizing it, I shall not object to it.

Mr. BLAINE. I presume the chairman of the committee will not dispute the fact that this enables us to carry out what at the last session we promised to do, and that my friend from Pennsylvania himself supported it.

Mr. STEVENS. There were various resolutions offered relative to the clerks—those who have been most vigilant; but there are a considerable number of clerks who were quite as much entitled to it who did not get the advantage of the resolutions. But the Senate refused to make the appropriation, and we adopted in lieu of it, for the clerks in both branches, twenty per cent. increase. I thought that had ended the matter. I am willing to equalize the whole, but I cannot vote for this amendment in its present shape.

Mr. BLAINE. This went in by general consent upon an amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois limiting it to the Thirty-Ninth Congress; but by some construction of the Auditor these clerks failed to get what the House pledged itself they should have; and now this appropriation is merely a question of good faith on the part of the House agreeing to do what it promised.

Mr. STEVENS. After that we passed in both branches a provision giving them twenty per cent. additional.

Mr. BLAINE. This has nothing to do with that.

Mr. STEVENS. So I suppose.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. An item on page 32 was stricken out in Committee of the Whole, namely: "For additional and temporary clerks in the Post Office Department, $40,000." I have a letter from the Postmaster General which I will ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, January 11, 1867.

SIR: The clerical force of this Department was increased by act of Congress February 16, 1866.

On July 23 following, an appropriation was made for compensation of authorized additional and for temporary clerks, $37,000 for the current fiscal year. The amount estimated for temporary clerks was $12,000. It was thought that the additional clerks authorized by the act of February 16, with the temporary clerks provided for July 23, would be sufficient. This expectation, however, has been disappointed, mainly owing to the unexpected amount of labor growing out of the restoration of mail service in the late insurgent States. When this work shall be accomplished, the number of clerks, regular and temporary, now provided for by law may probably be sufficient. It is manifest, however, that for another year from 1st of July next the number of temporary clerks must be increased, and for this purpose an appropriation of $40,000 has been asked.

It should also be noted that the money-order business is increasing more rapidly than was anticipated a year ago, which renders the more necessary the desired appropriation for the next fiscal year.

The "additional" clerks named in the appropriation of July 23, 1866, are females not included under act of February 16, 1866.

Yours, very respectfully,

ALEXANDER W. RANDALL,
Postmaster General.

Hon. JOHN F. FARNSWORTH,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I had a conversation—

Mr. WARD, of New York. I desire to ask the gentleman whether the increased labor alluded to by the Postmaster General in his letter is the increased labor which was caused by removing Union men and soldiers from post offices and substituting in their place copperheads and rebels?

Mr. FARNSWORTH. The letter explains itself. The Postmaster General says that this increased labor was caused by the opening of new mail routes in the southern States.

I had a conversation this morning with Mr. McLellan, the second Assistant Postmaster General, who made this estimate himself, and also with Mr. Zevely, and from conversation with those gentlemen I am satisfied that an appropriation of this sum or of some other sum will be necessary for the next fiscal year. A large number of temporary clerks are already employed in the Department.

I am very glad that such action has been had in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union as has brought this explanation before the House. Before this we had no explanation of this appropriation. Now, I am satisfied of its propriety, and I ask the House to non-concur with the Committee of the Whole in their action upon it.

The question was put; and the amendment of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was not concurred in.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to say a word or two in regard to the appropriation for five watchmen on reservation No. 2. That reservation includes the Smithsonian Institution, and their appointments are all authorized by law. I ask a separate vote on that amendment.

Mr. RAYMOND. On page 44 of the bill there was a clause appropriating $40,000 "for facilitating communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States by electrical telegraph." That clause was stricken out by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union last evening, for what reason I do not know. I desire to ask a vote upon that amendment in the House mainly for the purpose of asking from some person who may know it the reason for striking out this appropriation.

As I understand the matter, the appropriation was made in fulfillment of a contract provided for expressly by law. That contract was made in 1860 with the Western Union Telegraph Company, and gives $40,000 annually to that company; provided the amount of service rendered to the Government by the company reaches that sum.

Now, I do not know that any breach of contract on the part of the company is alleged further than is contained in some complaints that private messages have, in one or two instances, been overcharged. That, I understand from the company, was the work of its employés, without the sanction or approval of the company, and was at once corrected by the company as soon as it came to their knowledge. I have heard from no quarter allegations of any other breach of contract.

I desire to say further that I understand from responsible officers of the company that there is now due the company from the Government a larger sum for services rendered to the Government than is provided for by this appropriation. The amount of this appropriation is actually due for services already rendered. It is not a deficiency, but an annual appropriation.

Mr. STEVENS. I wish to say that this appropriation is for the future and not for the past.

Mr. RAYMOND. Certainly; but what has been done in the past has not been paid for, and is absolutely due.

Now, sir, if it will obviate objection in the mind of any gentleman, I will move a proviso to this clause—

That the sum of $40,000 hereby appropriated shall not exceed the amount that may be due the company for services rendered the Government during any year for which it shall be paid according to the rates fixed by law.

The proviso is not necessary, but it is simply offered to obviate the objections urged by some gentlemen. The rates fixed by law will be found in the law of 1862. The rate is three dollars for any dispatch. I think the company has fulfilled its contract with the Government, and I have yet to learn why the Government should not fulfill its part of the contract.

Mr. STEVENS. I cannot consent to have the amendment offered.

Mr. RAYMOND. I suppose a motion to restore the section would be in order.

The SPEAKER. The same object can be accomplished by voting down the amendment of the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. I desire to say a few words upon the proposition in relation to the pay of our clerks. The pay of our clerks was increased by our votes at the last session of Congress. I took some interest in the subject at that time, and gave it what consideration and investigation I could in the short time I had to spare; and if my memory serves me I prepared the clause which was adopted. The bill originally provided that this increase should be made permanently; but at the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] the increase was provided for only the Thirty-Ninth Congress. I afterward learned that the bill did not work equally in all respects; that some clerks, particularly in the lower part of the building, complained that it did not apply to them. I was very sorry, indeed, that it did not apply to them, for I designed to make it as general as my information on the subject would permit. It was conceded on all hands that the provision made for the clerks, which was included in the bill, was not too large; that they ought to receive the increased compensation which it provided. And I think it would be very unwise and very unjust for us now to refuse to make the appropriation to carry out the law which Congress intelligently made at the last session. If injustice has been done any one I am willing to vote to equalize this increased pay, if equalization does not exist when that question comes up in a proper shape. But I think it would be very improper to strike out here an appropriation to meet the exigency provided for at the last session of Congress.

Mr. SCHENCK. After what has been said by the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] and by others, it is hardly necessary for me to add remark or testimony on this subject. But it certainly does strike me that this is a question, not of legislation, but of appropriation. The legislation has already been passed; we have wisely or unwisely agreed to make a certain increase of compensation to certain classes of our clerks, it being intended to include all who might equitably be entitled to it and who had claims upon us. That law now stands in abeyance upon a question of construction, and we are appealed to here to take what steps may be necessary for the purpose. And the proposition is made here to appropriate the money necessary to carry out in good faith what Congress intended.

Now, it is too late to say that some persons are not benefited by that legislation who ought to have been benefited by it. Let that be provided for by legislation hereafter, if they have claims which we in justice ought to consider. Those clerks, however, who in good faith have accepted the pledge of that which Congress legislated to give them, have unquestionably arranged their expenses accordingly, have made their preparations, founded their expectations, and laid their plans all up to this time, with reference to having the money ultimately paid them which was thus proposed to be added to their pay. And it would be an act of exceeding unkindness, it would be ungenerous, it would be unjust, to say to these men that because we did not accomplish all perhaps which we ought to have done at that time, therefore we will not now pay to them what we undertook to pay to them.

I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] will not insist upon changing this matter. As to the way in which it came to be inserted in this bill I do not think the merits of the case are at all affected by any such consideration. I was not present at the time; but the amendment has been made in the Committee of the Whole, whether legally or illegally. It has been reported to the House and must now be acted upon. When we come to act upon it I hope we will not be thrust aside by any question which is not properly germane to the merits of the appropriation itself, but that we will vote upon it as a question of good faith and as a question of meritorious desert and claim on the part of the clerks as originally intended by us.

Mr. STEVENS. I have only to say that these different appropriations were all made last year before the twenty per cent. clause was inserted in the appropriation bill. I send up and ask to have read a statement prepared by the Clerk of this House upon this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

"All have already received twenty per cent. advance upon their previous salary, and this is permanent, voted in the act of July 23, 1866.

"If the resolutions are now executed, those included in them will receive, some twenty-five, some thirty, some forty, and some sixty per cent. additional on the pay as existing before any legislation was had. Those excluded will receive no increase beyond the general increase voted alike to all. The increase voted in the resolutions was irregular in amount, because the language of the resolutions differed, some referring back to the beginning of Congress, some to the beginning of the last session, &c., as the date at which the increase should begin.

"I suppose thirty or forty thousand dollars would be required to pay the resolutions.

"A letter from the Clerk of the House, transmitting the resolutions and the correspondence with the First Comptroller of the Treasury in regard to them, was on Monday presented to the House, and has not yet been printed.

Mr. STEVENS called for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. STEVENS. I yield for a moment to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say a word in reply to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND.] I moved to strike out this appropriation in regard to telegraphs, and if I may be permitted by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] who undertook to administer a sort of rebuke to me yesterday because I objected to paying $40,000 to a telegraph company that has violated its contracts, I will state the reason why I submitted my motion and why I presume the House sustained it.

It is well known to you, sir, and to the old members generally, that the contract with this telegraph company is one of the most extravagant and profligate contracts ever entered into by the Government. The company has made so much money out of this contract that it should be held to a strict performance of every obligation. The Senate has investigated this matter fully, and has found that the company has violated its contract. For this reason the Senate has in two instances, I believe, struck out the appropriation for this company. I think this is a good reason to induce us to strike out this proposition. The Senate, after full investigation, has rejected this appropriation, and we have concurred in their rejection. Why should we now send again to the Senate a proposition to appropriate money to this company?

Mr. BLAINE. In what respect has the company violated its contract?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It has over-charged and has delayed messages.

Mr. RAYMOND. With the consent of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] I desire to add a word or two on this subject. As I understand, the only reason assigned for the Government declining to fulfill its part of this contract is that the Senate has once or twice refused to make the appropriations to carry out the contract. I acknowledge that this would be a good reason, provided that the reasons which influenced the action of the Senate were such as to satisfy the judgment of this House. But the mere fact that the Senate has taken such action is no reason why we should blindly follow in its footsteps. I should be glad if the gentleman from Illinois would state the grounds on which the Senate acted. If he can show any instances in which the company has palpably and intentionally violated its contract I will yield my convictions on this subject as readily as any one. I would like to ask the gentleman whether there is any other allegation than this: that in one or two instances—and I think the names could be specified in all the instances which may be brought in question—the company's employés have made an overcharge for private messages from Denver east. I ask him further, whether in each of those cases the error was not corrected as soon as it was brought to the knowledge of the company?

If this contract is profligate, let Congress provide for its abrogation. I am perfectly willing, if the gentleman will allow me, to offer a proviso that this sum shall be appropriated in fulfillment of the contract, upon the condition that the company will consent to the abrogation of the existing contract upon the application of the Secretary of the Treasury or any other officer who may represent the Government in the matter. I submit that the gentleman should give us some better reason for violating a Government contract than the mere fact that the Senate refuses to consent to the appropriations required to carry out the contract.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask a separate vote on the amendment with reference to the additional pay of House clerks and employés.

Mr. GRINNELL. An amendment was adopted in Committee of the Whole, on my motion, striking out the provision for a "clerk of pardons." Learning from authentic sources that there is a necessity for this clerk, on account of the applications for pardons from persons imprisoned, &c., I am willing, upon deliberation, to consent that the provision for this clerk shall be retained.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the amendment will be reconsidered, and the clause restored to its original form.

There was no objection.

Mr. HALE. I ask a separate vote upon the amendment providing for a termination of the contract for furnishing volumes of the Congressional Globe to members of future Congresses.

The various amendments reported from the Committee of the Whole, except those on which a separate vote was demanded, were agreed to.

The Clerk read the following amendment of the Committee of the Whole, on which Mr. HALE asked a separate vote:

Provided further, That no appropriations shall be made for supplying complete sets of the Congressional Globe and Appendix to members of any succeeding Congress.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 24, noes 62.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HALE and Mr. FARNSWORTH were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 57.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

The question next recurred on concurring in the following amendment, on which a separate vote was asked by Mr. HALE:

Provided, That notice is hereby given that at the close of the Fortieth Congress of the United States will terminate the purchase of one complete set of the Congressional Globe and Appendix for each Senator, Representative, and Delegate, provided for by the act approved July 4, 1864.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 85, nays 55, not voting 51; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Delos B. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bidwell, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Dawes, Deftrees, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Goodyear, Grinnell, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Julian, Ketcham, Koontz, Kuykendall, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Lynch, Marvin, Maynard, McIndoe, McKee, McKuer, Mercur, Moorhead, Morris, Moulton, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plant, Pomeroy, Price, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Seofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spaulding, Stokes, Taber, Nelson Taylor, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Elihu B. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, and Williams—85.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Bergen, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Buckland, Campbell, Cooper, Dawson, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Eldridge, Glossbrenner, Hale, Hayes, Hise, Hogan, Holmes, Humphrey, Hunter, Jevons, Johnson, Kelley, Kelo, Kerr, Le Blond, Loan, Longyear, Marshall, McClurg, Mills, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Radford, William H. Randall, Raymond, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Stevens, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Andrew H. Ward, Welker, James F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—55.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, Beaman, Blow, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Delano, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eggleston, Garfield, Griswold, Harris, Hart, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jones, Kasson, Latham, Leftwich, Marston, McCullough, Morrill, Myers, Neill, Patterson, Phelps, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Francis Thomas, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Wright—51.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The question then recurred on the following amendment, on which a separate vote was asked by Mr. RAYMOND:

Strike out these words:

For facilitating communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States by electrical telegraph, $40,000.

Mr. RAYMOND. I ask unanimous consent to add the following proviso:

Provided, The company will consent to the abrogation of the existing contract upon the application of the Secretary of the Treasury.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object; they are not entitled to anything.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 63, noes 34.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The question next recurred on the following amendment, on which a separate vote was asked by Mr. BIDWELL.

Strike out the following:

For continuing the collection of reliable statistical information concerning the gold and silver mines of the western States and Territories, which shall include the labor and capital employed, the product and the modes of working the same, which information shall be reported to Congress, $10,000.

Mr. BIDWELL. I happened to be absent yesterday, and ask unanimous consent to make a few words of explanation.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I object.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 34.

Mr. BIDWELL demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The question next recurred on the following amendment, on which a separate vote was asked by Mr. STEVENS:

Strike out the following:

For compensation of five watchmen in reservation No. 2, $4,500.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The question then recurred on the following amendment, on which a separate vote was asked by Mr. STEVENS:

And be it further enacted, That to enable the Clerk of the House of Representatives to pay the increased compensation voted by the House during the Thirty-Ninth Congress to its employes, clerks and others, and to pay the increased rate of compensation thereby authorized, a sum sufficient therefor is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The question was taken on concurring in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole; and it was concurred in—ayes eighty-three; noes not counted.

The question recurred on ordering the bill, as amended, to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. BIDWELL. Is it in order to move an amendment?

The SPEAKER. It is not, the previous question having been moved.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STEVENS. I demand the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was passed.

Mr. STEVENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER. The next business in order is House bill No. 543, in regard to reconstruction.

Mr. STEVENS. There are a great many gentlemen around me who want a morning hour. I will agree, therefore, to have this bill postponed till the expiration of the morning hour.

No objection was made.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced, and the first business in order is Senate bill No. 380, to incorporate the Washington County Horse Railroad Company in the District of Columbia, being the unfinished business at the expiration of the morning hour yesterday, on which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MAYNARD. I yield to allow several gentlemen to offer resolutions by unanimous consent.

REPORTING CONGRESSIONAL PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. HILL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing under the law:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the reporting of the debates and proceedings of Congress by reporters chosen by each House thereof, and for the publication of such debates and proceedings at the Government Printing Office, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

REPORT OF FREEDMEN'S BUREAU.

Mr. ELIOT, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing under the law:

Resolved, That two thousand extra copies of the report of the Commissioner of the Bureau of Freedmen and Refugees be printed; one thousand for the use of the Commissioner and one thousand for the use of members of the House.

TEXAS DEBT.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which, being a call for executive information, was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to report to the House what amount of the debt due by the United States to the State of Texas previous to the rebellion yet remains unpaid, and whether the State of Texas has accounted for the money and stores taken by said State from the Confederate authorities upon the breaking up of the confederacy, and the amount of said money and stores.

INVESTIGATION AT WEST POINT.

Mr. ANCONA. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire into alleged abuses in the quality and charges for board and other articles furnished at West Point; that they have power to send for persons and papers and to proceed to West Point to prosecute the investigation, if in their judgment deemed expedient.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will ask my colleague on the committee to accept an amendment to his resolution. I understand the resolution is offered upon representations which have been made to my colleague on the committee, and through him to the committee. But if there should be an investigation instituted it seems to me it ought to be more general and not be confined to that particular matter. I ask the gentleman therefore to accept the following as an addition to his resolution:

In which case the committee shall extend its investigation as far as may seem to be required into other matters connected with the administration and discipline of the institution.

Mr. ANCONA. I accept it.

Mr. RADFORD. I object.

The SPEAKER. It is too late. The resolution is already before the House by unanimous consent.

The resolution as modified was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

KING AND WOOD.

Mr. HITCHCOCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of King & Wood, of the Territory of Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

MINERAL RESOURCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. HIGBY, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing under the law:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the expediency of having the report of J. Ross Browne to the Secretary of the Treasury upon the mineral resources of the United States printed in the French and German languages for distribution at the Paris Exposition.

TARIFF ON SILK GOODS.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making the tariff on silk goods imported into the United States specific, according to weight, instead of ad valorem, as recommended in the statement of Louis W. Viollier, herewith submitted for reference to said committee.

WASHINGTON COUNTY HORSE RAILROAD.

The House then proceeded to the consideration of the bill pending yesterday at the expiration of the morning hour, being Senate bill No. 380, to incorporate the Washington County Horse Railroad Company in the District of Columbia, reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia by Mr. MAYNARD.

The bill was read. It provides that Samuel P. Brown, Francis Mattingly, Noble D. Larner, Marshall Brown, and Joseph L. Pearson, and their associates and assigns be created a body corporate under the name of the "Washington County Horse Railroad Company," with authority to construct and lay down a double or single track railway, with the necessary switches and turn-outs in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia, as follows: commencing at Boundary street, at its intersection with Fourteenth street, and along the Fourteenth street road in a northerly direction to a point where said road intersects a new road recently opened by the levy court, and along said new road in an easterly direction to the Seventh street turnpike, and along said turnpike in a southerly direction to Boundary street; provided that the consent of the board of directors of the Seventh Street Turnpike Company be first obtained for the use of their road, with the right to run public carriages thereon, and receiving therefor a rate of fare not exceeding ten cents a passenger for any distance on said road.

The second section provides that the said railroad shall be deemed real estate, and it, with the other real and personal property of said body corporate, shall be liable to taxation as other real estate and personal property in the county aforesaid, except as hereinafter provided.

The third section provides that the said railway shall be laid in the most approved manner adapted for street railways, and that the tracks shall not be more than six nor less than four feet apart, and the gauge the same as that of the street railways in the city of Washington.

Section four provides that the tracks of the said railway shall be laid in such a manner as will least interfere with the ordinary travel of the roads over which the said tracks shall be laid.

The fifth section provides that this act of incorporation may at any time be altered, amended, or repealed by the Congress of the United States.

The sixth section provides that nothing in the act shall be so construed as to authorize said body corporate to issue any note, token, device, scrip, or other evidence of debt to be used as currency.

The seventh section enacts that the capital stock of said company shall be not less than two nor more than five hundred thousand dollars, and that the stock shall be divided into shares of fifty dollars each, and shall be deemed personal property, transferable in such manner as the by-laws of said company may direct.

The eighth section directs that the company shall place first-class cars on said railway, with all the modern improvements, for the convenience and comfort of passengers, and shall run cars thereon daily as often as the public convenience may require.

Section nine provides that the company shall procure such passenger rooms, ticket offices, stables, and depots at such points as the business of the railroad and the convenience of the public may require; and it authorizes the company to lay such rails as may be necessary for the purpose of connecting the said stables and depots with main tracks. It likewise authorizes the company to purchase or lease such lands or buildings as may be necessary for passenger rooms, ticket offices, stables, and depots above mentioned.

Section ten provides that all articles of value that may be inadvertently left in the cars or other vehicles of said company shall be taken to their principal depot and entered in a book of record of unclaimed goods, which book shall be open to the inspection of the public at all reasonable hours of business.

Section eleven provides that the corporation shall, on demand of the President of the United States, Secretary of War, or Secretary of the Navy, cause to be transported over said railway any freight cars laden with freight for the use of the United States; the officers causing such service to be done shall pay a reasonable compensation therefor.

Section twelve provides that within thirty days after the passage of this act the incorporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, or if any refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall cause the books of subscription to the capital stock of said company to be opened and kept open in some convenient and accessible place in the city of Washington, from nine o'clock in the forenoon until three o'clock in the afternoon, for a period to be fixed by said corporators, not less than two days; and said corporators shall give public notice, by advertisement in the daily papers published in the city of Washington, of the time when and the place where said books shall be opened; and subscribers upon said books to the capital stock of the company shall be held to be stockholders; provided every subscriber shall pay at the time of subscribing twenty-five per cent. of the amount by him subscribed to the treasurer appointed by the corporators, or his subscription shall be null and void. If a larger amount than the capital stock of said company shall have been subscribed, the books shall be closed, and the said corporators named in the first section shall forthwith proceed to apportion said capital stock among the subscribers pro rata, and make public proclamation of the number of shares allotted to each, which shall be done and completed on the same day that the books are closed; provided nothing shall be received in payment of the twenty-five per cent. at the time of subscribing except money. And when the books of subscription to the capital stock of said company shall be closed the corporators named in the first section, or a majority of them, and in case any of them refuse or neglect to act, then a majority of the remainder, shall, within twenty days thereafter, designate a day for the choice of directors, of which public notice shall be given for five days in two public newspapers published daily in the city of Washington, or by written personal notice to each stockholder by the clerk of the corporation; and in all meetings of the stockholders each share shall entitle the holder to one vote, to be given in person or by proxy.

Section thirteen enacts that the government and direction of the affairs of the company shall be vested in a board of directors, seven in number, who shall be stockholders, and who shall hold their office for one year and till others are duly elected and qualified to take their places as directed; and that the said directors (a majority of whom, the president being one, shall be a quorum) shall elect one of their number to be president of the board, who shall also be president of the company, and they also shall choose a treasurer, who shall give bonds with surety to said company in such sum as the said directors may require for the faithful discharge of his trust. It further directs that in case of a vacancy in the board of directors by the death, resignation, or otherwise, of any director, the vacancy occasioned thereby shall be filled by the remaining directors.

Section fourteen provides that the directors shall have full power to make and prescribe such by-laws, rules, and regulations as they shall deem needful and proper, touching the disposition and management of the stock, property, estate, and effects of the company, not contrary to the charter or to the laws of the United States.

Section fifteen provides that there shall be an annual meeting of the stockholders for choice of directors, to be holden at such time and place, under such conditions, and upon such notice as said company by their by-laws may prescribe, and said directors shall, when requested, make a report to the stockholders and to Congress of their doings.

Section sixteen provides that the company shall have at all times the free and uninterrupted use of their roadway, and if any person or persons shall willfully and unnecessarily obstruct or impede the passage on or over said railway, or any part thereof, or shall injure or destroy the cars, depot stations, or any property belonging to said railway company, the person or persons so offending shall forfeit and pay for every such offense the sum of twenty dollars to said company, and shall remain liable, in addition to the said penalty, for any loss or damage occasioned by his, her, or their act, as aforesaid, but no suit shall be brought unless commenced within sixty days after such offense shall have been committed.

Section seventeen provides that the company shall make and complete the railway within one year after the organization of the same.

The Committee for the District of Columbia reported the following amendments:

First amendment:

In line thirty-two of section twelve, after the word "thereafter," insert the words: "shall call a meeting," so that it may read "shall within twenty days thereafter call a meeting for the choice of directors," &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

The second and third amendments, which were merely verbal, also were agreed to.

The fourth amendment was to add to the bill the following as an additional section:

Be it further enacted, That the levy court of the county of Washington are hereby prohibited from doing any act or thing to hinder, delay, or obstruct the construction or operation of said railroad as herein authorized.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to amend this bill by adding to the section providing for the conveyance of passengers the proviso:

That it shall not be lawful for the said railroad company, through any of its conductors or agents, to collect fares for the transportation of passengers to whom a seat in such conveyance is not furnished.

Mr. GRINNELL. I ask the gentlemen to allow me to move to add the words, "without the consent of the passengers."

Mr. SCHENCK. No, sir, I cannot yield for that amendment. I have but a word to say in regard to my amendment. We are now about to charter, if this bill passes, a new street railway company in this District. It will be a sort of suburban railroad and may not be much affected by this amendment if it shall prevail; still, the amendment involves a principle which I should like to see ingrafted on this charter, as it ought to be on the charters of other companies.

This bill proposes to charter a railroad to commence at the end of Fourteenth street, where the existing railway terminates, to pass around the city returning into it at some other point. Without regard, however, to the route of the road, I think the principle of my amendment is correct, that when this company undertake to be common carriers they should do in good faith that which their undertaking binds them to do. Now, to accept passengers in any numbers and hang them on leather straps or crowd them like sheep or pigs into one of their conveyances is not carrying out their undertaking to convey passengers comfortably and properly, which, by making themselves common carriers, they have undertaken to do. I believe I have said once before to the House that the most patient ass in the world is the American people, as it regards submission to the impositions practiced on them by these various companies and corporations. Abroad nothing of this kind is permitted. Matters are much better regulated there so far as the police arrangements connected with such things are concerned. There the seats in public conveyances are all numbered, and each passenger gets his seat and keeps it. He is not liable to be imposed upon by having others thrust upon him more than the conveyance can hold. He is there recognized as having some rights. But here in this country—and we need not go far to get an exemplification of the fact—in an omnibus or railway car, as long as parties are to be picked up who are willing to be forced into a crowded car, which perhaps will steam with the perspiration engendered by this close packing, conductors feel themselves authorized to stop and take up such passengers; until it has passed into a proverb that there is always room for one more in an omnibus or railway car. Gentlemen may reply that this is the fault of the passengers; that if they choose to submit to such impositions they are to be held to it. Sir, it is the fault of the company in not furnishing a sufficient number of conveyances; and then the passengers, rather than not go, submit to impositions and take up with such accommodations as they can get.

Now, I want to guard them against such impositions. We will have no difficulty from crowded railways or omnibus conveyances if the principle I have indicated shall be established. Let it once be understood that they cannot collect fare of those to whom they do not furnish accommodations, and they will take care, as a matter of interest, to furnish sufficient accommodations for their passengers. Where they have one car now they will have two or three then if necessary. I think this little provision, more than any one thing else, would cure the whole of this evil—a simple provision that when this new company shall undertake to convey passengers for hire in their conveyances they shall provide proper accommodations, or else fail at their peril, because they will have no legal right to enforce and collect fare from such passengers.

Mr. GRINNELL. I desire to say, in reply to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] that I think his amendment is unprecedented, and will be very embarrassing to this new company. This railroad is to be established for the purpose of bringing the suburban population of this city into a nearer and closer communication with the heart of the city. If he will accept the amendment I have offered to his proposition, so that the fare shall not be collected from persons not having seats except by the consent of the person riding, I will not make any objection to the proposition. The fault the gentleman complains of is the fault of those who hang on the cars, who demand admission under the circumstances, and not the fault of the company. My friend himself would consider it a great hardship if during a rain-storm, when his carriage was not at hand, he was not allowed to get into a car out of the rain, because the seats were all taken before he applied for admission. Let my amendment be adopted and then if he gets into the car he can exercise his own option in regard to paying the fare.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will say simply this to the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL,] there will be no necessity for his amendment if we give to a man the legal right not to have fare collected of him unless he is provided with a seat, for he can waive that right if he thinks proper. If I go to a tavern and ask for lodgings, and I am content to be put into the cellar or a coal-hole or upon the floor, and waive my privilege of going where I can get a bed, I can do so. The effect of the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] is to reenact the common law, which gives every man the right, if he thinks proper, to waive his legal rights. I propose to give every person a legal right against these corporations if they do not supply him with the accommodations the law requires. Then, if he is fool enough to waive those rights, he has the common-law right to do so.

Mr. GRINNELL. My answer to that is, that most people do not understand the common law; they only understand the common principle that if they ride they must pay.

The question was upon the amendment of Mr. GRINNELL to the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I call the previous question on the bill and pending amendments.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The first question was upon the amendment of Mr. GRINNELL to the amendment of Mr. SCHENCK.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK,] and also to the amendment to the amendment, offered by the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL,] though if the idea of the gentleman from Ohio meets the favor of the House it would be better that the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa should prevail. The amendment of the gentleman from Ohio proposes to declare it unlawful for the agents of this corporation to collect fare from any person to whom a seat is not furnished. No option is to be left to the person riding or to the conductor as to the payment or collection of the fare. I submit to the House that such a provision is unjust to the company we now propose to incorporate. This company proposes to construct a railroad running out into the country for the benefit of the poor people who live in the suburbs of the city and for the convenience of the departmental clerks. Now, sir, if it were probable that the travel on this railroad would be regular, that there would be ten, fifteen or twenty passengers for each car on each trip, the gentleman's amendment would be proper enough; and I would have no objection to it. But it is well known that there are times when the cars, even on Pennsylvania avenue, run empty or almost so, while at other times every car is crowded. The travel fluctuates. So it must be with this railroad, the construction of which we now propose to authorize. At the hour when the clerks leave the Departments, there would be hundreds wishing to ride, while at other times the passengers would be but few. Can this Congress with any justice require this company to keep six, eight, or ten cars in waiting at certain hours to accommodate a momentary rush of passengers? This would impose upon the company a hardship which would result in the abandonment of the project. The Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company and the Metropolitan Railroad Company, already incorporated, are not subjected to any such requirement.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman from Illinois yield to me for a moment?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will hear any suggestion of the gentleman.

Mr. HILL. I desire to read the requirement which is imposed upon the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company by its charter:

"The said company shall place first-class cars on said railways, with all the modern improvements for the convenience and comfort of passengers, and shall run cars thereon during the day as often as every five minutes, except as to Seventh and Fourteenth streets, and on these once in fifteen minutes each way, and until twelve o'clock at night as often as every half hour; and throughout day and night as much oftener as public convenience may require."

Mr. INGERSOLL. All that there is in that section is incorporated in this bill.

Now, sir, let me state for the information of the House that this company proposes to commence its road at the terminus of the Fourteenth street railroad, extending it about a mile and a half into the country, then crossing over to the Seventh street turnpike, and coming down Seventh street to the terminus of the Seventh street railroad. The whole extent of the route is about four miles. It will run through a suburban portion of the District which at present is sparsely populated, but which is being settled by clerks and mechanics and laborers, the very men for whom above all others we should provide accommodations of the sort here proposed.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] yield to me for a question?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir.

Mr. COBB. The gentleman has stated the route of this railroad. I wish to ask him in this connection whether the route which he describes does or does not run around what is known as the "Corcoran farm," and whether he knows or has heard that this proposition for chartering a railroad is part and parcel of a job for the sale of that "Corcoran farm" to the Government for a presidential mansion and park, and the Lord knows what all?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No, sir; I have heard nothing of the kind; and even if it were true it would not affect this question, which is one involving the interests, not merely of those who are to be the corporators of this road, but of those who now reside and shall hereafter take up their residence in that section of country through which the road is to pass.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will not detain the House in reference to this matter any longer, except to add that a reservation is made in this bill by which Congress retains control over this road, so that if these powers be abused or the public be put to inconvenience in regard to the running of the cars or anything else, we can at any time alter, amend, or abolish the charter.

Mr. MAYNARD. I was called away temporarily from my desk when the consideration of this bill was resumed this morning. When I reported it I intended to yield to any gentleman who thought proper to make the motion, which I was not authorized to make myself, that each Senator, Representative, and Delegate during his official term should be permitted to ride free on the cars of this company as a matter of right. I will not give my views in this connection; but it would relieve the members of this House from some insinuations and imputations and suggestions which are thrown out, and which are not very pleasant to hear. I will not move the amendment myself, but will yield to any gentleman who may think proper to do so.

It was intimated by a question which has been propounded that this is a private enterprise, a matter of private speculation. Undoubtedly it is so. Those who invest in railroads do not do so without expecting to make something. That is undoubtedly so. This will afford access to country I do not know how many miles from the Capitol, and will enlarge the area, where those who are engaged here in the Government service may seek homes for themselves. It will be of great benefit to the public; and, as has been well said, the bill contains a reservation by which Congress may alter and amend or abolish this charter if it be abused.

Mr. GRINNELL's amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK's amendment was also defeated. The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

FIRST CONGREGATIONAL SOCIETY.

Mr. INGERSOLL, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back Senate bill No. 253, to incorporate the First Congregational Society of Washington, with the following substitute:

That Hiram Barber, Roswell H. Stevens, Charles H. Howard, Silas H. Hodges, Henry A. Brewster, John W. Rumsey, David M. Kelsey, Abner T. Longley, Benjamin F. Morris, William T. Bascom, S. C. Pomeroy, and Calvin S. Mattoon, and their associates, are hereby created a body politic and corporate by the name of "The First Congregational Society of Washington;" and as such may purchase, hold, and convey real and personal estate, make contracts, sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, and may exercise all such powers as are requisite to enable them to sustain religious worship in Washington, in the District of Columbia, and to erect and maintain edifices for that purpose, and parsonages; and said society shall be exempt from any taxes to be assessed upon their property, under the authority of Congress, or of the District of Columbia, or the city or county of Washington: Provided, That the whole value of their property shall not exceed $200,000.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the first meeting of said society shall be held at the time and place at which a majority of the persons herein above named shall assemble for that purpose; and six days' notice shall be given each of said corporators; at which meeting, and at all annual meetings, and at all meetings specially called for that object, said society may enact, amend, or repeal by-laws regulating the government of said society; prescribing the number, character, and duties of their officers, and the manner of their election; defining the terms on which members may be admitted to it, and shall cease to be such; and providing in all things for the management of the affairs of said society or for securing its interests and welfare.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That the powers of this corporation shall vest in a board of trustees, who shall be chosen as provided by the by-laws, and shall consist of five persons, and shall have perpetual succession, each one holding his office until his successor is chosen and qualified.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If it is in order I suggest that my friend from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] should add a proviso to this bill that no more persons should be admitted into this church than they have eligible seats for. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I would then perhaps deprive the gentleman from Illinois of the means of grace, and I know none who so much needs it. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. Of late I have associated much with the gentleman from Ohio, and consequently I shall not insist that he shall offer the proviso.

Mr. THAYER. Has it been customary in acts of incorporation of religious societies in Washington to insert a clause of exemption from taxation? If it has I then do not object; but if not, inasmuch as equality is the essence of justice in taxation, I move to strike it out.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That question came up in the committee, and we were reliably informed that no church in Washington paid taxes of any kind on church property.

Mr. THAYER. Assuming that statement to be correct I shall make no objection.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUSTICES OF THE PEACE IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. WELKER, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back House bill No. 571, to regulate proceedings before justices of the peace, and for other purposes, with a substitute therefor.

The substitute, which was read, provides that justices of the peace in the District of Columbia shall have jurisdiction in all cases where the amount claimed does not exceed $100, except in cases involving title to real estate, actions for assault and battery, slander, &c. It further provides that the supreme court shall establish rules of practice and forms of proceedings and fix and determine fees and costs to be taxed; that all justices of the peace may issue civil and criminal warrants returnable before themselves, but causes may be removed on filing a proper affidavit that the applicant believes he will not get a fair and impartial trial on account of prejudice or other reasonable cause; that no person shall be fined for disorderly conduct unless guilty of acts disorderly in themselves; and that in all criminal cases the justice shall allow the defendant reasonable time to prepare for defense or bail. It repeals all acts of the Legislature of Maryland or of Congress now in force inconsistent with this act, which takes effect from and after its passage.

Mr. WELKER. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the substitute.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the substitute was agreed to.

The bill as amended was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WELKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table. The latter motion was agreed to.

GRAND AND PETIT LARCENY.

Mr. WELKER, from the same committee, reported back House bill No. 431, defining and providing for the punishment of grand and petit larceny, with a substitute therefor.

The substitute, which was read, declares stealing to the value of thirty-five dollars to be petit larceny, and punishes the same by imprisonment at hard labor not less than one year nor more than three; it declares the stealing of bank bills, promissory notes, receipts, checks, bonds, &c., of the value of thirty-five dollars a misdemeanor, and affixes the same punishment; also the buying and receiving of stolen goods or chattels, promissory notes, &c., of the like value knowing the same to be stolen. It also affixes penalties for embezzlement and for the fraudulent taking of goods by common carriers. It provides that all persons sentenced to imprisonment in jail may be employed under regulations prescribed by the supreme court, the proceeds thereof being applied to pay the expenses of their trial and conviction, and that the supreme court shall make proper regulations necessary for the health and proper treatment of the prisoners. Four peremptory challenges are allowed to the defendant; payment of necessary witness fees and costs are allowed the same as Government witnesses are now paid; attorneys who may be assigned by the court are not to be paid more than twenty-five dollars; all laws of the District inconsistent with the provisions of this act are repealed, and the act takes effect from and after its passage.

Mr. MAYNARD. I appeal to my colleague on the committee [Mr. WELKER] to allow me to offer a single amendment. One of the sections of the bill provides that—

"On the trial of any person charged with crime the punishment whereof may be confinement in the penitentiary or district jail, the defendant shall be entitled to four peremptory challenges of jurors."

I desire to move that instead of four, ten peremptory challenges be allowed. So far as I have had an opportunity to observe the criminal practice of the country that would not be an undue provision in favor of the personal liberty of parties accused of crime.

Mr. WELKER. I have no objection to yielding to allow the amendment to be offered.

Mr. MAYNARD. I do not intend to argue it.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I hope it will not be adopted.

Mr. WELKER. The practice of nearly all the States does not allow so many challenges in criminal trials in these prosecutions as the amendment proposes. With the exception of Tennessee I do not know of any State that allows more than four challenges. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendment of Mr. MAYNARD was disagreed to.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. WELKER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. WELKER, the title of the bill was amended so as to read, "A bill providing for the punishment of certain crimes therein named, and for other purposes."

TRANSPORTATION AND COAL COMPANY.

Mr. WELKER also, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with an amendment, bill of the House No. 592, to incorporate the Washington Transportation and Coal Company.

The Clerk proceeded to read the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, (interrupting the reading.) Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. WELKER. Certainly.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hear the name of Charles Knap among the incorporators. Is this bill for the benefit of the Johnson committee which existed here during the last campaign?

Mr. WELKER. Not that I know of.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. He was treasurer of the committee through which black-mail was levied upon office-holders.

Mr. WELKER. I do not know anything about that, although I see his name among the incorporators.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over until to-morrow.

NUMBERING OF HOUSES IN WASHINGTON.

Mr. INGERSOLL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee for the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of having the houses in the city of Washington numbered in accordance with the system adopted by the city of Philadelphia, and report by bill or otherwise.

PRINTING OF MILITIA BILL.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio, from the Committee on Printing, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That three thousand extra copies of the bill to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, and for other purposes, referred to the Committee on the Militia January 3, 1867, be printed in pamphlet form for the use of said committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is that for the members of the committee or for the members of the House? It seems to me too large a number for the members of the committee.

The SPEAKER. For the use of the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to strike out the words "said committee" and insert "House," so as to have these bills printed for the use of the members of the House.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. This resolution is reported in response to a request of the Committee on the Militia for copies of the bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is entirely unprecedented. I never knew a resolution of this kind to pass.

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio. I object to the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN.] I do not, for one, want any copies of this bill.

The question was taken on Mr. WASHBURN's amendment; and it was agreed to.

The question recurred upon the adoption of the resolution as amended; and being put, there were—ayes 28, noes 42; no quorum voting.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CLARKE, of Ohio, and WASHBURN, of Illinois, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported one in the affirmative; and a further count not being demanded, the resolution was disagreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was rejected; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BRIDGES ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI.

Mr. HOGAN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to repeal the second section of the act authorizing the construction of certain bridges, approved July 25, 1866; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

HARBOR OF ONTONAGON.

Mr. DRIGGS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, requested to send to this House any surveys and estimates for improving the existing harbor at Ontonagon, on Lake Superior, in the State of Michigan, that may be in his possession; and if no such estimates have been made then that he cause the same to be done and sent to this House as soon as practicable.

PUBLIC COAL LANDS, ETC.

Mr. DRIGGS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act for the disposal of coal lands and of town property in the public domain," approved July 1, 1864, and to amend an act supplemental thereto, approved March 8, 1865; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

TWENTY-FIRST NEW YORK CAVALRY.

Mr. HOTCHKISS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of the members of the twenty-first regiment New York cavalry volunteers; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

ADMISSION OF COLORADO AND NEBRASKA.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I was necessarily detained from my seat during the first days of this week. I ask leave of the House merely to have printed in the Globe a statement, which I have prepared, of how I would have voted upon several propositions had I been present.

Mr. LE BLOND. I am willing that my friend shall record his vote, as the rest of us were allowed to do. But I must object to his being allowed to hand in for publication in the Globe his statement in writing of how he would have voted.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I would be very glad to have my vote recorded now, if I can be allowed to have it done.

The SPEAKER. That can be done only on Monday, by a suspension of the rules.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. Cannot leave be given by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. Under the rule the Speaker cannot even ask unanimous consent for a member to vote who was not present, when his name was called.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I hope my colleague [Mr. LE BLOND] will allow my remarks to go in the Globe.

Mr. LE BLOND. I do not wish to give my friend any more privileges than were granted to us. I would have been very glad to have given my reason for the vote I desired to give but was not permitted to do so. I must object. Subsequently Mr. LE BLOND withdrew his objection.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, renewed the objection.

Subsequently Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, withdrew his objection.

No further objection being made,

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, accordingly obtained leave to have printed in the Globe the following:

On Tuesday, January 14th, the Senate bill providing for the admission of the new State of Nebraska into the Union, came before this House and was passed. I was unavoidably detained from my seat in the House during the first three days of the week, and so did not vote on the bill or amendments thereto. I wish to say merely that if I could have been in the House I would have voted for the final passage of the bill. I would have voted for the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] The bill as it came from the Senate, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts, both provide for the same thing; that is both make it a fundamental condition that there shall be no denial of the right of suffrage on account of race or color. The Senate inserted a provision in the bill to that effect, known as the "Edmunds amendment," being section three of the bill in these words:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that within said State of Nebraska there shall be no abridgment or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise, or of any other right, to any person by reason of race or color, (excepting Indians not taxed.)

The "Boutwell amendment" is in these words:

Strike out the third section of the Senate bill and insert in lieu thereof:

And be it further enacted, That this act shall take effect with the fundamental and perpetual condition that within said State of Nebraska there shall be no abridgment or denial of the exercise of the elective franchise or of any other right to any person by reason of race or color, excepting Indians not taxed; and upon the further fundamental condition that the Legislature of said State, by a solemn public act, shall declare the assent of said State to the said fundamental condition, and shall transmit to the President of the United States an authentic copy of said act, upon receipt whereof the President, by proclamation, shall forthwith announce the fact, whereupon said fundamental condition shall be held as a part of the organic law of the State; and thereupon, and without any further proceeding on the part of Congress, the admission of said State into the Union shall be considered as complete. Said State Legislature shall be convened by the territorial government within thirty days after the passage of this act, to act upon the condition submitted herein.

The only difference is that the latter amendment requires the assent of the Legislature of the new State. I regard it as eminently proper that the people of this new State, speaking through their Legislature, should decide for themselves this whole question of suffrage; and this is authorized by the amendment of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] If it shall receive their sanction that settles the question. And I understand the Senators from this new State desire this course to be taken.

There is one other reason for this. Many of us desire the speedy admission of this new State, and it is perfectly well understood that the bill cannot pass over a veto unless the amendment is agreed to.

The bill for the admission of Colorado was passed, and I should have voted for that bill also if I had been present. It will be seen the bills for the admission of these two new States came to us from the Senate. It is not necessary to say what might or would have been the vote of this House if the "Edmunds amendment" had not been inserted in the Senate, and if no provision had been inserted on the subject of suffrage. But however much some members of this House might feel disposed to vote for or against these bills if they had contained no provision as to suffrage, yet it is perfectly well understood that a bill in that shape could not have passed.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be the consideration of House bill No. 543, to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights.

The pending question was upon the substitute of Mr. STEVENS, upon which Mr. BAKER was entitled to the floor.

Mr. BAKER then proceeded to address the House. [His remarks will be published in the Appendix.]

Mr. STEVENS, by unanimous consent, during the remarks of Mr. BAKER, modified his substitute by striking out of it the following:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the State governments now existing de facto, though illegally formed in the midst of martial law, and in many instances the constitutions were adopted under duress and not submitted to the ratification of the people, and therefore are not to be treated as free republics, yet they are hereby acknowledged as valid governments for municipal purposes until the same shall be duly altered, and their legislative and executive officers shall be recognized as such.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, I had meditated no remarks and shall yield a portion of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY,] and therefore I will not long occupy the attention of the House. I feel as if there was a demand upon us for action rather than for hypercriticism. I should have been much better pleased with the remarks of the able gentleman who has just taken his seat [Mr. BAKER] if he had directed his attention to perfecting a bill rather than in technical opposition to the proposition now before the House.

Mr. BAKER. I thought the Committee on Reconstruction were incomparably more competent to perfect a bill than myself, or even the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. GRINNELL,] if he will pardon me for saying so.

Mr. GRINNELL. I am perfectly willing to surrender the most of my labors and rights; but I am not willing, at this stage of the proceedings of Congress, to surrender this great question of reconstruction to the joint Committee on Reconstruction, while I believe if this subject were so referred to that committee it would end the question of reconstruction for this session. I desire immediate action upon the subject; and it is my conviction that if there is any voice this Congress ought to hear it is the voice of the suffering in political chaos and of the loyal people of the States, demanding of us early and decisive action with reference to these rebellious States. Why, sir, it is the easiest thing in the world for a man to tear down. History tells us that Nero set Rome on fire and fiddled over the ruins. Yet it is not known that he could erect a dog-kennel. It becomes us not to be destructives where there is so much ruin and chaos, but to be builders. I am willing that these bills presented by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] and the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] shall be taken up in Committee of the Whole and considered, amending them wherever necessary, if they are not already perfect, as I do not think they are. The eloquent gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE,] who has manifested great energy and zeal to destroy, had, I thought, better occupied himself with building up and perfecting a bill rather than destroying this now amended by the framer by changing a few words. So with the learned gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] who spoke yesterday with so much power, but with little constructive purpose. I thought I understood him to be ready for radical methods; yet he desires that this question shall go to the Committee on Reconstruction. If I were on the committee it would seem to me not the most modest proposition in the world for me to urge the reference to my committee of a great question which the House generally desires to consider, giving perhaps the younger members, and from different sections, such opportunities as would otherwise be denied them.

But the gentleman proposes that we shall defer our action till the constitutional amendment has been adopted or has been well considered. This involves waiting. Why, sir, does the gentleman desire to have that amendment with the animus of traitors hurled back in his face again by those States? What is the fact? The amendment has been fairly presented before the Legislature of each of those rebel States; and every State except Louisiana has rejected it, and that State has yet taken no action. Yet the honorable gentleman desires that we shall wait and hold ourselves in subserviency when those States, he is well aware, still continue to refuse its adoption.

The Legislatures of the loyal States have assembled; their Governors have spoken. What do they say? Examine the executive messages and the resolutions of the Legislatures and you will find them demanding stronger guarantees and equal justice, and declaring that it is time to act. The constitutional amendment being rejected by the rebel States, let Congress now go to work and frame governments for those now defiant and rebellious. Let there be justice meted out and safety for the loyal millions. Yet the gentleman from Ohio thinks that we had better wait; that we had better refer the subject to his committee. I do not disagree with him in his patriotic utterances, but in his methods, by which it is proposed to consolidate and bless a people now to be molded by our will and law.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. DAWSON,] who spoke yesterday and whom I now see in his seat, charges that New England especially desires to put off and hinder this work of reconstruction for mercenary purposes. Here is his language:

"We cannot shut our eyes to the fact that, having heretofore profited so largely by shaping the legislation of the country to her own advantage, she is now, with concentrated energy, struggling to maintain that advantage even at the sacrifice of the Union of the States. She dreads a full representation of the great agricultural South, acting in conjunction with the great agricultural Northwest and the commercial interests of New York and the States of the Pacific coast."

Sir, I feel that I should be an unworthy son of New England and an unfit representative of a State so deeply imbued with her principles if I did not repel this charge as too base for belief in this House. It was the fashion a few years ago to say that the Northwest was allied to the States in rebellion; that it would go out with them rather than abide with New England and Pennsylvania and New York. But the contrary of this has been shown. Did not the States of the Northwest during the war with promptness meet every demand of the Government? Did not their troops fight even to the death? And did they not in the last election give more than one hundred thousand majority against Democratic conservatism and in favor of sustaining Congress? They have not now, and never had, any idea of mercenary or political alliance with the South. Let me tell the gentleman from Pennsylvania that the majority in the Northwest is composed of neither traitors nor free-traders. They believe in the Union they fought for—in the Government; they believe in justice, and ask no peculiar privileges, but seek for the enforcement and vindication of the rights of man as man, regardless of fortune, regardless of color or race.

I cannot refrain from calling attention to another very unfortunate allusion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania who opposes reconstruction, whose whole argument ranks him with the destructionists rather than with the constructionists now entered upon the work of preparing governments for the States late in revolt. Here is his allusion:

"You will remember, sir, that the Roman republic granted the full rights of citizenship even to the aliens of conquered provinces, and this regardless of the bitterness and obstinacy of their resistance to the standard of the republic. When once subdued and their defeat acknowledged, they were received into the enjoyment of equal rights with the inhabitants itself. 'I am a Roman citizen' was the talismanic formula which secured the inhabitant of distant Sicily protection against the extortions of a Verres as much as it did from any other injury the dweller upon the Seven Hills."

This is the gentleman's historical illustration, beautiful in itself; and what is the application he proposes to make of it? That you are to let these rebels in unquestioned, though they may throw the mild offers we have made and constitutional amendment in your face. We are to embrace them without a guarantee. They do not say they are repentant. They do not confess they were in the wrong; they only want to come into the family of the Union again; and having great experience in oath-taking and perjury, the leaders can with greater facility sting the heart of the old mother even to death.

Now, sir, to make his illustration pertinent he should apply it to the four million black men in the South and of mixed colors. They were our friends, and they are still intelligently loyal. That cry two thousand years ago, "I am a Roman citizen," was an exclamation which commanded respect and protection all over the world. But what to-day is the condition of our friends in the South? The black man cries out: "I am an American citizen!" He wears the uniform of an American soldier. What is the response? "Make the trial of his murderer a mockery. Trample him down. Pursue him to the death." We cannot close our eyes to the fact that not less than five thousand of these defenders have been cut down by those southern traitors, those very men whom gentlemen would bring back here to give them a numerical respectability.

Yes, sir, let us apply these words to our own time, and then we shall not be deserving of the reproach of the civilized world. We certainly will deserve that reproach if we do not succor the imperiled millions and see justice done to those who fought in defense of the life and liberty of the nation.

What is the demand in this bill? It is for full justice. Can it be obtained without restricting these States? Ask any Democrat here if he is willing to extend equal rights and privileges in these ten States. No, sir; they are not in favor of taking one step in that direction, though they do not allow in a neutral State a man to carry the gun which he used against rebels and in our cause. They fine them five dollars and take away the gun if found in their possession. And in Mississippi a black man cannot own a rood of land outside of incorporated limits. Is that liberty? Yet we hear men saying, "O brothers, come back; Congress is waiting to forgive you of the ten rebel States for all your starving of prisoners and your robberies and murders."

I cannot be a party to any such transaction, and I appeal to this House in the effulgence of this century, in the name of its soldiers and all true hearts, that we shall do justice to the poorest, that we shall at least protect those wasting and like the slain under the altar who cry "how long, how long!"

I do not advocate the gallows for all these traitors; I do not say we shall hang them, but it is my conviction that some of them should suffer. Nor will I talk of punishing these men by exile. No, sir, I would not be lost to humanity so far as to banish such miscreants, men so lost to honor, to other countries. I would not even poison Austrian society nor the air of Australian convicts with their presence. All we propose is to allow them to remain among the loyal, to let the black men have equal rights with them. If that be a punishment to these rebels, very well; it is so far short of their expectation and desert. We have the right to say to ex-slaves now friendless in South Carolina and Georgia, that they shall have an equal chance in the race of progress with our enemies, and that in these incipient measures none unconvicted of crime shall be denied a voice.

It is said this will demoralize and degrade the people there. Is it a degradation to traitors to make our friends their equals? I do not fear that; I only fear the wrong of delay to make a compromise with injustice, and I do not want to see the woes we have just borne again brought upon the country by neglects or a compromise which would invite the vengeance of a just God.

Mr. Speaker, this question will take care of itself, only allow the ballot. You will find these Democrats under political bonds taking the black men under their care, as in this city I am told since the colored men have been entitled to vote the Democrats begin to court and caress them; and to suppose that that ingenious, unscrupulous party, that managed to keep itself in power for forty years by appeals to the prejudices of Irish votes and by the use of whisky, is so scrupulous in methods and choice as to its companions as not to seek the negro vote by fair promises, is a manifest absurdity. Let them be welcome to such a fraction as they can earn by good conduct only. Let the black man have the ballot, let him have justice meted out to him; for he deserves to be enfranchised. He was our friend when the clouds of heaven rolled black over us; and our responsibilities only began when we broke his chains and made him a soldier of the Republic.

Let me relate a little incident. It is known in this House that I was very anxious that all the black men, North and South, that could possibly be enlisted should be placed in the Army to help put down the rebellion. I introduced a resolution to that effect, and it passed the House of Representatives. Shortly afterward I met Mr. Lincoln, and he asked me to come to his room, when he said to me: "That resolution implies that we are not doing all we could; but I am glad that Congress has indorsed the policy of actively enlisting black men. It implies that if they are enlisted and fight for the country it must do something more for them. It is a great day for the black man when you tell him he shall carry a gun. Now," said Mr. Lincoln, "tell your people in Iowa, and your friends in Congress if you choose, that the time has come when I am for everybody fighting the rebels. Let Indians fight them; let the negroes fight them; and if you have got any strong-legged jackasses in Iowa that can kick rebels to death they have my hearty consent," [laughter;] and added, "When you give the negro these rights, when you put a gun in his hands, it prophesies something more: it foretells that he is to have the full enjoyment of his liberty and manhood."

Happy for the nation's future if we would take up the prophecy and make his philosophy our guide in this political crisis, and never be a party to a wrong done to a human being because he is black or because he has been a slave.

I had intended before I closed to have read an extract from a memorial address to this House by Judge Thomas J. Durant, of New Orleans, in behalf of the loyalists, in which he describes truthfully the condition of that country, the murders and outrages that prevail, and I might read from the scores of letters just sent to the venerable gentleman near me [Mr. STEVENS] which are enough to stir the blood of age and ought to convince us of the necessity of early and prompt action. I will ask to have the concluding portion of the memorial read.

The Clerk read as follows:

"What is the remedy for so great an injustice to the faithful friends of the nation, and so palpable a danger to the body-politic? As the facts cannot be denied, and the great Law Giver of the universe cannot permit so crying an injustice, the remedy must be found and applied. Moreover, the loyal masses have willed that no single fruit of the hard-earned victory shall be lost. We respectfully submit the propositions of the loyal Union sufferers, whose devotion has been proven, and whose claims cannot be disregarded without peril to the nation, not from us, but from your undisguised enemies and ours, as a basis for decisive action. The remedy is plain and simple. The nation's valor, with the blessing of Heaven, has conquered those who voluntarily, willingly and persistently made themselves public enemies, and involved their States in all the consequences of conquered insurgents. If traitors, they forfeited their rights to life, liberty, and property; if, as they claim, they were a nation of public enemies, the territories and districts which have been conquered are subject to the law-making power, which alone can decide, accept, and legalize war and peace. In every light, therefore, the power exists, and the necessities of the case demand immediate and prompt action.

"A long line of precedents, both of the United States and of these same rebels as 'confederate States,' have established that whatever authority in a State is recognized by the political or law-making power of the nation is the lawful government, is the State, and there is no appeal from this decision but by the bayonet. We pray you, then, to set aside these hostile organizations, illegally and unconstitutionally created and incapable of self-government, because hostile to the nation; and, under the nation's power as conservator of the peace, authorize the loyal and true men, regardless of race or color, to organize governments, excluding so many of the unrepentant rebels as shall be found necessary for the permanent security and preservation of the Union. In this way and in no other, we verily believe those guarantees may be obtained which clearly define and certainly protect the American citizen, equalize representation, give suffrage to loyal voters only, disqualify the traitor for franchise and office, make secure the national debt incurred in the cause of liberty, forever silence the holders of the rebel promises, elevate manhood, reward devotion to the Union, and secure the blessings of liberty to our posterity and yours.

We plead for these things, not for ourselves and fellow-sufferers only, but for our still bleeding country, from which capital, enterprise, free labor, free speech, the blessings of education, the rapid strides of internal improvements, and large progressive views are virtually expelled by ignorance, stupidity, bigotry, treason, and rebellion.

We ask for early, speedy, sharp, short, and decisive action; and we ask it in the names and behalf of the millions of devoted friends of the Union inhabiting the best parts of the continent, no one of whom can claim that he enjoys the blessings of free republican government or the security which the Constitution of the United States guarantees to the citizen."

Mr. GRINNELL. Allow me to say, in conclusion, that it rests upon us to decide at an early day whether we are to allow rebels to come and take their seats here unwashed, unrepentant, unpunished, unhung, [laughter;] or whether we will heed the voice of our friends, fleeing from the South for their lives; whether we will listen to the supplication of four million black people, all true to the great principles which we here seek to establish. For one I urge the earliest action. I desire we should place those States in a position where a home may be possible, where education may be established, where the ballot may be secured to all those who are loyal to this Government. Yes, sir, education and the ballot, as I have read history, they will be as the urim and thummim, the polished stones to be placed in this great temple of national liberty now being reared by the American Congress. Let us have no delay, no recommitment; rather the earliest action upon this bill, as the requirement of the people who have saved the country; what the suffering implore, what justice demands, and what I believe God will approve. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Minnesota, [Mr. DONNELLY.]

Mr. DONNELLY took the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman will allow me to say a word?

Mr. DONNELLY. Certainly.

Mr. STEVENS. As this bill now stands the pending motion is to commit it to the Committee on Reconstruction. I desire to say to the House that if the motion to commit shall be voted down, it is not my intention to call the previous question, but to afford an opportunity to any gentleman who may desire to offer amendments.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that if a demand for the previous question on the motion to commit should be sustained, the previous question, would not exhaust itself until the third reading of the bill, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. STEVENS. I did not intend to move the previous question on that motion, but to say that after the vote is taken on the motion to commit, if that motion shall be voted down, I intend to leave the bill open for gentlemen to offer amendments to it. I should like to say a few words myself before the vote is taken on the motion to commit.

Mr. DONNELLY resumed the floor.

Mr. BINGHAM. With the permission of the gentleman from Minnesota, I will move that the House adjourn, as the hour is late.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] at what time he expects the debate to close upon this proposition?

Mr. STEVENS. I understand that a large number of gentlemen have put down their names as desiring to speak upon it.

The SPEAKER. Quite a number of gentlemen desire to speak.

Mr. STEVENS. I do not wish to deprive them of the opportunity within reasonable limits.

Mr. SPALDING. I suggest to the gentleman that he fix the 10th day of next month as the day for closing the debate.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that at the rate at which the debate has been progressing, about two speeches a day, the Chair knows of enough gentlemen desiring to speak as would occupy the next two weeks.

PRINTING OF NAVY REGISTER.

Mr. LATHAM. I rise to a privileged question. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the members of this House fifteen hundred extra copies of the Navy Register for 1867.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Cannot we put in also the Army Register?

The SPEAKER. That was not referred to the committee, and they can only report under the law upon what is referred to them.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. LATHAM moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NEW YORK POST OFFICE SITE.

On motion of Mr. RAYMOND, by unanimous consent, joint resolution of the House No. 229, to procure a site for a building to accommodate the post office and United States courts in New York city, which had been returned from the Senate with an amendment, was taken from the Speaker's table, and the amendment of the Senate was concurred in, as follows:

Add to the resolution the following proviso:

Provided, that the title to said property shall be approved by the Attorney General of the United States.

Mr. RAYMOND moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. BINGHAM, (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.,) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By Mr. ARNELL: A memorial from a portion of the colored men of the State of Alabama, asking a repeal of the three per cent. tax on cotton.

By Mr. BINGHAM: The petition, together with exhibits, of John Fordyce, of Ohio, for relief.

Also, the petition, together with exhibits, of Peter D. Robins, of Ohio, for relief.

By Mr. FERRY: The petition of Thaddeus L. Waters, Norman Cunningham, Morgan Thompson, Patrick Rooney, and 30 others, citizens of Muskegon county, Michigan, praying for the restoration to market and settlement certain lands in said county reserved originally under Indian treaty, &c., the term of reservation having now expired.

By Mr. GARFIELD: The petition of J. L. Hartzell, and 32 others, citizens of Berlin, Mahoning county, Ohio, praying for increased protection on American wool.

By Mr. HARDING, of Illinois: The petition of cigar-makers of Quincy, Illinois, praying that specific duties and revenue stamps be substituted for the ad valorem and present tax, under which, by frauds, their business is destroyed.

By Mr. HOGAN: A memorial of the North Missouri railroad, of Missouri, praying for certain relief.

By Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts: The petition of Franklin Snow, &c., and Albert Bouker, for a change of register.

By Mr. HUBBARD, of New York: The petition of Eleazer Brown, and 54 others, citizens of Norwich, in the county of Chenango, New York, praying for the immediate passage of a tariff which shall conform to the bill agreed upon by the joint committee of wool-growers and manufacturers; and which passed the House of Representatives at its last session.

By Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio: The petition of W. W. Wood, and 95 others, citizens of Marysville, Ohio, remonstrating against any immediate contraction of the currency.

By Mr. HUMPHREY: Remonstrance of citizens of Buffalo, New York, against granting American registers to foreign-built vessels.

By Mr. INGERSOLL: The petition of John B. Nixon, and 250 others, citizens of Woodhull, Illinois, praying for a daily mail from Oneida to Woodhull.

By Mr. JULIAN: The memorial of the working men, mechanics, and others, employed in the Washington navy-yard, asking an increase of compensation.

Also, the memorial of J. E. Wallace, praying such action by Congress as will compel the State of Louisiana to retrocede all swamp lands within her borders originally donated for levee purposes which have not already been sold to bona fide purchasers, and asking for an appropriation to defray the expense of repairing the levees of said State.

Also, the petition of 28 citizens of Richmond, Indiana, manufacturers and journeymen cigar-makers, to alter the present system of stamping by selling stamps to manufacturers at five dollars per thousand, and to increase the penalty for violating the internal revenue laws.

Also, the petition of 21 citizens of Indiana, praying the impeachment of the President of the United States for high crimes and misdemeanors.

By Mr. KOONTZ: A petition of certain citizens of Franklin county, Pennsylvania, asking for change of time of departure of mails from Greencastle, on route No. 2559, from twelve o'clock m. to six o'clock p. m. of each day, and for increased pay for carrying the mails on said route.

By Mr. LAWRENCE, of Pennsylvania: Two remonstrances from citizens of Waynesburg and vicinity, in the county of Greene, Pennsylvania, against any curtailment of the national currency.

By Mr. MOORHEAD: A petition of Nimick & Co., C. G. Hussey, and others, citizens of Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, praying that the law of copyright be extended to trade-marks.

By Mr. PIKE: The petition of J. A. Milliken, and 13 others, of Cherryfield, Maine, in aid of the petition of Robert L. Willey for pension.

By Mr. ROLLINS: The petition of W. F. Lahey, and 27 others, citizens of New Ipswich and Manchester, New Hampshire, journeymen cigar-makers and manufacturers of cigars, representing inequality and injustice in the tax law passed last session of Congress, and praying for a modification of the same.

By Mr. VAN AERNAM: The petition of Mrs. Almira Thompson, asking compensation for services as volunteer nurse during the war for the Union.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, January 18, 1867.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY.
The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following communication from the Governor of the State of Kentucky:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE,

FRANKFORT, KENTUCKY, January 14, 1867.

Hon. President United States Senate:

In obedience to the requirements thereof, I herewith transmit to you "resolutions in regard to the proposed amendment of the Constitution of the United States," adopted by the General Assembly of Kentucky, now in session.

Respectfully, THOMAS E. BRAMLETTE, Governor.

Resolutions in regard to the proposed amendment of the Constitution of the United States.

Whereas the Congress of the United States did, at the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, propose to the Legislatures of the several States, as an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, the following:

ARTICLE XIV.

SECTION 1. All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

SEC. 2. Representatives shall be apportioned among the several States according to their respective numbers, counting the whole number of persons in each State, excluding Indians not taxed. But when the right to vote at any election for the choice of electors for President and Vice President of the United States, Representatives in Congress, the executive and judicial officers of a State, or the members of the Legislature thereof, is denied to any of the male inhabitants of such State, being twenty-one years of age, and citizens of the United States, or in any way abridged, except for participation in rebellion or other crime, the basis of representation therein shall be reduced in the proportion which the number of such male citizens shall bear to the whole number of male citizens twenty-one years of age in such State.

SEC. 3. No person shall be a Senator or Representative in Congress, or elector of President and Vice President, or hold any office, civil or military, under the United States, or under any State, who having previously taken an oath as a member of Congress, or as an officer of the United States, or as a member of any State Legislature, or as an executive or judicial officer of any State, to support the Constitution of the United States, shall have engaged in insurrection or rebellion against the same, or given aid or comfort to the enemies thereof. But Congress may, by a vote of two thirds of each House, remove such disability.

SEC. 4. The validity of the public debt of the United States, authorized by law, including debts incurred for payment of pensions and bounties for services in suppressing insurrection or rebellion, shall not be questioned. But neither the United States nor any State shall assume or pay any debt or obligation incurred in aid of insurrection or rebellion against the United States, or any claim for the loss or emancipation of any slave; but all such debts, obligations, and claims shall be held illegal and void.

SEC. 5. That Congress shall have power to enforce, by appropriate legislation, the provisions of this article.

And whereas the same has been officially laid before this Legislature for its consideration and action: Therefore, be it

1. Resolved by the General Assembly of the Commonwealth of Kentucky, That the proposition to amend the Constitution of the United States as aforesaid be, and the same is hereby, rejected.

2. Resolved, That the Governor be requested to notify the proper departments of the United States Government of this action of the Kentucky Legislature in regard to said proposed amendment.

H. TAYLOR,

Speaker of the House of Representatives.

RICHARD T. JACOBS,

Speaker of the Senate.

THOMAS E. BRAMLETTE,

Governor of Kentucky.

Approved 10th January, 1867.

By the Governor:

JOHN S. VAN WINKLE, Secretary of State.

The communication and accompanying resolutions were ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented two petitions of citizens of Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill No. 708, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, now pending in the Senate; which were ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. WADE. I also present a petition very numerously signed by the cigar-manufacturers of Cleveland, Ohio, in which they complain that the inspection of cigars is very irregular, in some districts different from what it is in others, greatly to the detriment of the petitioners, &c. Finally, they request that a specific duty of five dollars per thousand be levied upon all domestic cigars, and they state that they earnestly approve of the present tariff on imported cigars, and hope it will not be changed. As this subject, I believe, has been reported upon, I move that the petition be laid upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of Major General George H. Thomas and other officers in the United States Army, praying that when officers are withdrawn from active service and placed upon the retired list they may be allowed to retain their service or longevity rations; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON presented twelve petitions of officers of the United States Army, praying for an increase of pay; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILSON. I also present the petition of George W. Paschal, of Texas, praying that the present system of exterminating Indians be discontinued, as it is very expensive to the Government and ineffectual; and that a system for their civilization be adopted by the establishment of missions to feed, clothe, and educate them, both adults and children, and that the privileges of citizenship be conferred upon them at as early a date as possible. I move the reference of this petition, which states many facts bearing on the subject to which it refers, to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

It was so referred.

Mr. LANE. I present two memorials, numerously signed by respectable citizens of Indianapolis, Marion county, Indiana, praying Congress not to pass any law curtailing the national currency, or providing for a return within a limited time to specie payments; and also that no redemption of the national currency shall be required at the city of New York. I ask their reference to the Committee on Finance.

They were so referred.

Mr. HENDERSON presented two petitions of citizens of Missouri, praying for the imposition by Congress of a duty of at least thirty cents per bushel on flax-seed; which were ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I present two petitions, signed by business men of the city of Indianapolis, reciting that "the further reduction of the volume of the currency at present would prove highly injurious to the banking, manufacturing, and mercantile interests of the country, and would entail suffering upon nearly every member of the community;" expressing the opinion "that if such currency shall now be contracted, we are near to the time when the lawful obligations of citizens cannot be met; when the demands of the national Government, together with the heavy taxes levied by our State and municipal authorities, cannot be paid, and when many of our good citizens will have to submit to a confiscation of their hard-earned property." They therefore ask Congress to refrain from the passage of any law authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, and also to refrain from passing any law compelling all national banks, wherever located, to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting national banks from paying or receiving interest on bank balances. These petitions are signed by business men of such high respectability that I feel it my duty to call the attention of the Committee on Finance to the subject. I ask their reference to that committee.

They were so referred.

Mr. MORRILL. I present a petition of citizens of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, who represent that they are suffering from the delay of Congress in failing to pass the bill already reported by the Committee of the Senate on the District of Columbia in regard to the aqueduct across the Potomac, and praying action in that behalf. It is numerously signed by highly respectable citizens of that city. I also present on the same point two other petitions very numerously signed by respectable citizens of Georgetown. As the subject is now pending before the Senate I move that these petitions lie upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILLEY presented a petition of members of Kanawha Lodge No. 25, Independent Order of Odd Fellows, of West Virginia, praying to be remunerated for the use of and the damage done to the building used by them as a lodge-room, and for losses sustained by the destruction of their regalia, emblems, jewels, &c., by United States troops in 1862; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

Mr. CRAGIN presented a petition of Ezra B. Gordon, late a private in company F, fourth regiment New Hampshire volunteers, praying for a pension for disability incurred in the line of his duty; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RAMSEY presented a petition of clerks employed in railway post offices, praying for an increase of compensation; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SHERMAN presented seven petitions from citizens of Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, at least so far as it relates to the duties on imported wool; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of journeymen cigar-makers and manufacturers of cigars of Cincinnati, Ohio, praying for a specific duty of five dollars per thousand on all domestic cigars, that the present tariff on imported cigars may remain unchanged, and that Congress will alter the present system of selling stamps to the manufacturers at five dollars per thousand, and increase the penalty for violating the internal revenue laws; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONNESS. I present the petition of all the officers engaged in the military service of the United States on the Pacific coast for an increase of their pay, either by paying the amount which they now receive in gold coin, which is the currency there in circulation, or its equivalent in paper. They state that coin is virtually the recognized currency in the Pacific States and Territories, and that the coin prices of commodities in those States and Territories are greater than the legal-tender prices of the same in the eastern States. The allowance for servant hire for officers is less than one third the amount of a servant's wages on the Pacific coast. They further state what their compensation amounts to when reduced to gold, which is the circulation there, giving the emoluments of a captain at $96 25 a month, and so on. This petition is signed by a large number of officers, and I know of my own knowledge that there is a necessity for granting their request. I move the reference of the petition to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and I invite the attention of that committee to it.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SUMNER. I present the petition of the National Equal Rights League Convention of Colored Men, held at Washington, January 10, 11, and 12, 1867. In presenting this very important petition, I shall not err if I call the attention of the Senate especially to its prayer. They say this:

"Wherever your jurisdiction extends, and especially throughout all the Territories lately in rebellion, where States are in due time to be reconstructed, and the whole subject of the rights and franchises of citizenship is to be adjusted, there we ask you to secure to our people impartial suffrage and all the rights and privileges of American citizens, equality before the laws of our country."

They then proceed to say:

"Permit us further to remind you that the loyal whites throughout the portion of our country late in rebellion unite with one voice to implore you to make the elective franchise impartial, irrespective of race or color, believing it to be essential to their own safety as well as to ours, and altogether vital to the effective reconstruction of civil government and the ascendancy of loyal citizens in its administration."

In enforcing this prayer the petitioners dwell with admirable effect on the promises of the Declaration of Independence, which they ask Congress to carry out; and they conclude as follows:

"We ask a reconstruction therefore, gentlemen, which, founded on impartial justice, brings safety and peace to the loyal white American, happiness and prosperity to our common country, while it is the shield and buckler, the strong defense of the American freedmen. Our plea is before you."

This petition is signed by John M. Langston, president of the National Equal Rights League Convention of Colored Men and by the three secretaries of the convention.

You do not forget, Mr. President, that Lord Chatham, when the papers of the American Congress reached England, declared from his seat in Parliament that there was nothing in the political history of mankind which he had read with more respect and admiration. He pronounced those papers to be master-pieces. But I venture to say, sir, that among the papers at that time laid before Parliament there were none to which that designation was more entirely applicable than to this memorial and to the resolutions adopted at the same time by that convention. That convention was held here in Washington. Numerous as it was, and composed of delegates from seventeen States, it is perhaps not too much to characterize it as in itself a congress—a congress of colored persons held here in the national capital in order to plead with you, sir, on the critical condition of the country.

I have said that seventeen States were represented. These were Kansas, Indiana, Ohio, Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, Kentucky, Tennessee, Louisiana, Massachusetts, and California, and also the District of Columbia. The number of delegates was one hundred and ten. They represented well nigh all the callings of life. There was one lawyer among them, and he was their President—John M. Langston, of Ohio. There were also among them two doctors, B. W. Arnett and H. J. Brown, of Pennsylvania.

There were three bishops, Wayman, Green, and Talbot; ten ministers of the Gospel; three professors of colleges; five school-teachers; five graduates from colleges; three professional lecturers; two editors and publishers of newspapers; two grocers; one merchant; two cotton planters; a large number of mechanics and farmers; one ex-captain and two ex-lieutenants of the United States service, and three ex-chaplains. Let me add to this characterization that a large majority of the delegates were once slaves, and many of them gained their freedom through the recent war.

I think, sir, I do not err when I say that such a convention of colored people assembled here in the national capital is in itself an event; but if you will only carry out their prayer, you will create an epoch in the history of this country and in the history of civilization. Sir, in their prayer I unite absolutely, and gladly place myself by their side.

I ask that this petition be referred to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

It was so referred.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am requested to ask leave, on behalf of Mrs. Mary Ann Sands, to withdraw the petition and papers praying for compensation for services rendered by her brother, Joseph Gideon, as acting purser of the United States storeship Fredonia, which were presented by her at the Thirty-Eighth Congress. I am told that the papers were presented by myself. I do not now recollect about the facts connected with the case, nor do I recollect what was the action of the committee with regard to it; but on her behalf her attorney in New York, Mr. Tremaine, has asked for the withdrawal of the papers; and I move that leave be given to withdraw them so that they may be sent to her.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HOWE, it was Ordered, That Knauth, Nachod & Kühne, importers of dry goods in the city of New York, have leave to withdraw from the files of the Senate their petition, praying for relief for the loss of goods stolen from the appraisers' storehouse while in the care and keeping of Government officials.

On motion of Mr. HOWARD, it was Ordered, That the petition of John Watters, a lieutenant in the United States Navy, praying for compensation for property destroyed by the burning of the United States receiving-ship Pennsylvania, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HOWARD, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 173) for the relief of Ober, Nanson & Co., merchants of New York, reported it without amendment.

NATIONAL CEMETERIES.

Mr. WILSON. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia to report back without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 788) to establish and protect national cemeteries; and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. The first section provides that in the arrangement of the national cemeteries in the States lately in rebellion and in the District of Columbia, established for the burial of deceased soldiers and sailors, the Secretary of War shall have them inclosed with a good and substantial stone or iron fence; and hereafter such cemeteries are to be laid out in sections, to contain not less than two hundred nor more than three hundred graves; and to each section there shall be erected a marble or granite monument on which shall be inscribed the name of each soldier buried in such section, with his rank, number of his regiment, his company, and State.

The second section provides that each grave shall be marked with a small marble or cast-iron headstone, with the number of the grave thereon corresponding with the number opposite to the name of the party inscribed on the monument. And national cemeteries already established are to be made to conform, as far as practicable, to the foregoing plan.

Section three directs the Secretary of War to erect at the principal entrance of each of these national cemeteries a suitable building to be occupied as a porter's lodge, and to detail a meritorious and trustworthy sergeant to reside therein for the purpose of guarding and protecting the cemetery and giving information to parties visiting it. The Secretary is also to detail some officer of the Army, not under the rank of colonel, to visit annually all of the cemeteries, and to inspect and report to him their condition and the amount of money necessary to protect them, to sod the graves, gravel and grade the walks and avenues, and to keep the sections and grounds in full and complete order; and the Secretary is to transmit the report to Congress at the commencement of each session, together with an estimate of the appropriation necessary for the purpose.

By section four any person who shall willfully destroy, mutilate, deface, injure, or remove any tomb, monument, gravestone, or other structure, in any of the national cemeteries, or shall willfully destroy, cut, break, injure, or remove any tree, shrub, or plant within the limits of any of them shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and upon conviction thereof before any district or circuit court of the United States within any State or district where any of the cemeteries are situated, shall be liable to a fine of not less than twenty-five nor more than one hundred dollars, or to imprisonment of not less than fifteen nor more than sixty days, according to the nature and aggravation of the offense. And the sergeant, or other officer on guard, in charge of any national cemetery, is to have authority to arrest forthwith any person engaged in committing any misdemeanor thus prohibited, and to bring such person before any United States commissioner or judge of any district or circuit court of the United States within any State or district where any of the cemeteries are situated, for the purpose of holding the person to answer for the misdemeanor.

The fifth section proposes to make it the duty of the Secretary of War to purchase from the owner or owners thereof, at such price as may be mutually agreed upon between them and the Secretary, such real estate as in his judgment is suitable and necessary for the purpose of carrying into effect the provisions of the bill, and to obtain from the owner or owners title in fee-simple. In case the Secretary of War shall not be able to agree with the owner or owners of any real estate needed for the purpose of the act upon the price to be paid therefor, or to obtain from them title in fee-simple, he may enter upon and appropriate any real estate which, in his judgment, is suitable and necessary for the purposes of the act.

By the sixth section the Secretary of War, or the owner or owners of any real estate thus entered upon and appropriated, may make application for an appraisement of the real estate thus entered upon and appropriated to any district or circuit court within any State or district where the real estate is situated; and those courts upon such application, and in such mode and under such rules and regulations as they may adopt, are to make a just and equitable appraisement of the cash value of the several interests of each and every owner of the real estate and improvements thereon entered upon and appropriated for the purposes of the act.

The seventh section provides that the fee-simple of all real estate thus entered upon and appropriated for the purposes of the act, and of which appraisement shall have been made under the order and direction of the courts, shall, upon payment to the owner or owners respectively of the appraised value, or in case the owner or owners refuse or neglect for thirty days after the appraisement of the cash value to demand the same from the Secretary of War upon depositing it in the proper court to the credit of the owner or owners respectively, be vested in the United States; and its jurisdiction over this real estate shall be exclusive and the same as its jurisdiction over real estate purchased, ceded, or appropriated for the purposes of navy-yards, forts, and arsenals. The Secretary of War is to pay to the several owner or owners respectively the appraised value of the several pieces or parcels of real estate as specified in the appraisement of the courts, or to pay into court by deposit the appraised value; and the sum necessary for such purpose may be taken from any moneys appropriated for the purposes of the act.

The eighth section appropriates $50,000 to carry out the purposes of the act.

Mr. WADE. I have seen some of the iron monuments provided for by this bill, and I think it is not creditable to the country to have such monuments over the graves of our soldiers. They are small cast-iron slabs, not more, perhaps, than eighteen inches high.

Mr. RAMSEY. Not over twelve inches.

Mr. WADE. Perhaps that is it; I did not measure them. They look more like a tin kettle than anything else, and are liable to be kicked off and kicked about and changed from one grave to another by any mischievous person. I think the Committee on Military Affairs cannot have seen a specimen of them. They seem to me to be totally inadequate for the purpose contemplated, and it is discreditable to the country to erect such things as monuments for its soldiers.

Mr. CONNESS. A kind of solemn toy!

Mr. WADE. Yes, a solemn toy, or whatever you please. It is a burlesque rather than a monument. If we cannot do any better than that, I would much rather that nothing should be done. I think it is discreditable to us, and must be a means of wounding the feelings of the relations of the soldiers who may have occasion to visit the cemeteries where their remains are deposited.

I hope the bill will not pass in this form. I think it had better lie over, and let the Committee on Military Affairs inspect these monuments and see if some better model cannot be adopted. I was assured by persons in charge of some of the cemeteries that they were entirely opposed to the adoption of any such plan or style of monument, and I agree with them most heartily. I think if the Military Committee will look into the subject they will come to the same conclusion that I have arrived at. There are other gentlemen here who inspected some of these cemeteries at the same time that I did, and who as I understood came to the same conclusion.

Mr. WILSON. By existing law the War Department was authorized to prepare these monuments, and I am told they have agreed upon this plan. I have no particular reason for pressing this bill now if the Senate does not wish it acted upon at present. I am willing to take time to make further inquiries. The main feature of the bill, however, and the great object is to get possession of the land necessary for the sites of these cemeteries. The objection which the Senator makes is simply to the second section of the bill, which is only carrying out what has already been adopted. It may be necessary that Congress should arrest it, and I have no objection to allowing the bill to lie over that I may make immediate inquiry in regard to what has been done by the Department which would be covered by the second section. The other sections of the bill, in regard to obtaining the title to land, are very important to be passed.

Mr. RAMSEY. I think if the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs would inquire of the Quartermaster's Department in this city he would find a large number of protests there from all those who have charge of these national cemeteries in the South against the adoption of this plan, which seems to have met the approbation of the Department, of iron tombstones, so called. They almost universally object, and there are many representations on file upon the subject. I think the committee should take some steps immediately to check the further execution of the contract if it has already been entered into. It is unquestionably wrong.

Mr. WILSON. I have no objection to the bill lying over, and I shall call it up after I have made the necessary inquiries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator make that motion?

Mr. WILSON. I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the further consideration of the bill be postponed.

The motion was agreed to.

MINISTER AT VIENNA.

Mr. SUMNER. I offer a resolution of inquiry, which I should like to have acted on to-day:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if in his opinion not inconsistent with the public interest, any correspondence between the Department of State and Mr. Motley, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at Vienna, relating to his reported resignation of this post.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will lie over under the rules.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 510) declaring a bridge to be built over the Missouri river at the town of St. Charles, in the State of Missouri, by the North Missouri Railroad Company, a legal structure and a post road; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

On motion of Mr. MORRILL, the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 253) to incorporate the First Congregational Society of Washington, was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

On motion of Mr. WADE, the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 380) to incorporate the Washington County Horse Railroad Company in the District of Columbia, were referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

REMOVALS FROM OFFICE.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the resolution offered by me two or three days ago, calling on the various heads of Departments for information in relation to removals from office and appointments to office in their respective Departments from March 4, 1861, to March 4, 1865.

The motion was not agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 229) to procure a site for a building to accommodate the post office and United States courts in New York city.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 571) to regulate proceedings before justices of the peace in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes; and

A bill (H. R. No. 896) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1867.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up for consideration House bill No. 388.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 388) to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Potomac railroad into and within the District of Columbia.

The preamble of the bill recites that it is represented to the present Congress that the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, incorporated by an act of the General Assembly of Maryland, passed the 6th day of May, 1853, are desirous, under the powers which they claim to be vested in them by the provisions of that act, to construct a lateral branch from the Baltimore and Potomac railroad to the District of Columbia; and it is therefore proposed by the bill to authorize the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company to extend into and within the District of Columbia a lateral railroad, such as the company shall construct or cause to be constructed in a direction toward the District, in connection with the railroad which they are about to locate and construct from the city of Baltimore to the Potomac river, in pursuance of their act of incorporation. The company are to exercise the same powers, rights, and privileges, and be subject to the same restrictions, in the extension and construction of their lateral railroad into and within the District, as they may exercise, or are subject to, under and by intent of their charter in the extension and construction of any railroad within the State of Maryland; and to be entitled to the same rights, compensation, benefits, and immunities in the use of the road, and in regard thereto, as are provided in their charter, except the right to construct any lateral road or roads within the District from the lateral branch or road authorized by the bill; it being expressly understood that the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company shall have power only to construct from the Baltimore and Potomac railroad one lateral road within the District to some point or terminus within the city and county of Washington, to be determined in the manner subsequently mentioned.

Before the company shall proceed to construct any railroad which they may lay out or locate on, through, or over any land or improvements, or to use, take for use, any earth, stone, or other materials necessary for the construction of the road, on any land within the District, they shall first obtain the assent of the owner of such land, improvements, or materials, or if such owner shall be absent from the District, or shall refuse to give his assent on such terms as the company shall approve, or because of infancy, coverture, insanity, or any other cause, shall be legally incapable of giving such assent, then it shall be lawful for the company to apply to a justice of the peace of the county of Washington, who shall thereupon issue his warrant, under his hand and seal, directed to the marshal of the District, requiring him to summon a jury of twenty citizens of the District, none of whom shall be interested or related to any person interested in the land or materials required for the construction of the railroad, or a stockholder, or related to any stockholder in the company, to meet on the land, or near to the other property or materials required, on a day named in the warrant, not less than ten nor more than twenty days after its issue, to proceed to value the damages which the owner or owners of any such land or other property will sustain by the use or occupation of the same required by the company, and the proceedings, duty, and authority of the marshal in regard to such warrant and jury, and the oath or affirmation to be administered, and inquisition to be made and returned, shall be the same as are directed and authorized in regard to the sheriff by the thirteenth section of the act of the General Assembly of Maryland, incorporating the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company; and all the other proceedings in regard to such jury, and the estimating and valuation of damages, and the payment or tender of payment of any damages ascertained by such valuation and the effect thereof, and of the view of any lands, or other property, or materials, as to giving the company a right to use the same for the use or construction of any railroad within the District, are in every case and in every respect to be the same as is provided in and by the act of incorporation in regard to the railroad thereby authorized to be constructed by the company; but whenever by that act the inquisition of the jury is required to be returned to the clerk of the circuit court, to be confirmed by that court at its next session, if not sufficient cause to the contrary be shown, the inquisitions under this act shall be returned by the marshal to the supreme court of the District of Columbia, which court shall have the same jurisdiction and powers over the subject-matter as the said circuit court would have under the act of Maryland.

Whenever the company, in the construction of a railroad into or within the District shall find it necessary to cross or intersect any established road, street, or other way, it shall be the duty of the company so to construct the railroad across such established road, street, or other way, as not to impede the passage or transportation of persons or property along the same; and where it shall be necessary to pass the railroad through the land of any individual within the District, it shall also be the duty of the company to provide for such individual proper wagon ways across the railroad from one part of his land to another; but nothing in the act is to be so construed as to authorize the entry by the company upon any lot or square, or upon any part of any lot or square, owned by the United States, or by any other body or bodies, private or corporate, or by any individual or individuals within the limits of the city of Washington, for the purposes of locating or constructing the road, or of excavating the same, or for the purpose of taking therefrom any materials, or for any other purpose or uses whatsoever; but the company, in passing into the District, and constructing the railroad within it, shall enter the city of Washington at such place, and shall pass along such public street or alley, to such point or terminus within the city as the company shall find best calculated to promote the objects of the road; but the level of the road within the city is to conform to the present graduation of the streets, unless the corporation shall agree to a different level.

The rate actually charged and received on all that part of the road within the District is not to exceed eight cents per ton per mile for both tolls and transportation, and to be the same each way; and the privileges granted by the bill are upon the condition that the company shall charge the same rate of toll upon the same articles going either way between Baltimore and Washington.

The company are also to be empowered to make such special contract with any duly authorized officer or agent of the United States for the conveyance of the mail or the transportation of persons or property for the use of the United States, on any railroad which has been or shall be constructed by the company, on such terms as shall be approved of by the competent officer or authority; and in all such instances to receive the compensation so agreed for, according to the terms of each contract.

The company may charge and receive, for taking up and setting down any passenger or traveler within the District, conveyed a shorter distance than four miles, a sum not exceeding twelve cents.

Unless the company shall commence the lateral road authorized by the bill within two years, and complete it with at least one set of tracks within four years from its passage, then the act, and all rights and privileges granted by it, shall cease and determine. But the act is not to be so construed as to prevent the Congress of the United States from granting the same or similar privileges to any other company or companies incorporated or to be incorporated by the State of Maryland or by Congress, or from authorizing, by any future law, such additional railroads or roads, in connection with this road, so as to extend it, or to construct others connected therewith, to such parts of the District as from time to time may be required by the convenience of those parts of the District into which the company are now restrained from carrying their road, or from enacting such rules and regulations, prescribing the speed of cars or carriages passing over the road, and any other matters relating thereto, necessary for the security of the persons and property of the inhabitants of the District, in such manner as to the present or any future Congress shall seem expedient; and nothing contained in the act is to be construed to give any rights or privileges to the company beyond the limits of the District of Columbia.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia was in section three, lines twenty-five, twenty-six, and twenty-seven, to strike out the words "the said company shall find best calculated to promote the objects of said road," and in lieu thereof to insert "may be allowed by Congress upon presentation of survey and map of proposed location of said road;" so as to read:

Shall enter the city of Washington at such place, and shall pass along such public street or alley to such point or terminus within the said city as may be allowed by Congress upon presentation of survey and map of proposed location of said road.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to section eight the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That Congress shall have power to alter, amend, or repeal this act.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I move further to amend the bill by striking out in lines sixteen and seventeen of section three the words "or by any other body or bodies, private or corporate, or by any individual or individuals." If those words remain they are entirely repugnant to the objects of the bill, and I do not see how the company could get their road into the District at all. If these words be stricken out the section will read: "upon any lot or square, or upon any part of any lot or square, owned by the United States within the limits of the city of Washington." Of course the road must pass over somebody's property, and the bill provides for the manner in which that property may be condemned, if necessary, in the usual way.

Mr. JOHNSON. I suppose that amendment is necessary to enable the bill to operate, because the road must pass over property belonging to the public or belonging to some individual; and if I understand the amendment, the Senator from Ohio proposes to strike out the latter words. I have no objection to that amendment, but I trust he will oblige me by letting the bill go over. Indeed I believe the time has come for the termination of business of the morning hour.

Mr. WADE. I should like to make a couple of verbal amendments, which will not take more than a few moments.

Mr. JOHNSON. I have no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, this bill can only be proceeded with by common consent.

Mr. WADE. It will not take two minutes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I feel it my duty to object. It will evidently take some time.

Mr. WADE. No, I only wish to make two verbal amendments.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Well I will give you five minutes. Let the special order be laid aside informally for that time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The special order is laid aside by unanimous consent for the purpose indicated.

Mr. MORRILL. I wish to suggest to the Senator from Ohio that I hardly think the language which he proposes to strike out is repugnant to the general object of the bill or that any embarrassment can arise from it. If he thinks so, however, I shall not object to the amendment.

Section one authorizes the location of this road; section two provides the manner of purchasing the right of way, and on failure to purchase the right of way, the manner in which they may condemn it; and I think this language is put in simply to prevent their doing it without condemnation.

Mr. WADE. No, it would prevent them going on the land of private owners at all.

Mr. MORRILL. Very well, if the Senator thinks so I shall not object to his amendment.

Mr. WADE. There can be no objection to it. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. I move to amend the bill further by striking out in line thirty of section three the words "the said corporation" and inserting "Congress," leaving it entirely under the control and direction of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON. Does the term "corporation" as there used apply to the city?

Mr. WADE. I presume it does. The language is "that the level of said road within the said city shall conform to the present graduation of the streets, unless the said corporation shall agree to a different level." I want it to read: "unless Congress shall agree to a different level." Congress has entire control of the subject by other provisions.

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly if the word "corporation" there applies to the city the amendment is right.

Mr. WADE. Undoubtedly it applies to the city and cannot apply to anything else.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WADE. Now, I move in line thirty-one of that section to strike out "agreed to" and insert "authorized;" so as to read "unless Congress shall authorize a different level." This is a mere verbal amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That change will be made, no objection being interposed.

Mr. JOHNSON. If the Senator from Ohio is through with his amendments I desire to repeat the suggestion which I before made that he would oblige me by letting the bill go over.

Mr. WADE. I do not ask any further action now. Let it go over and stand as unfinished business for to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is Senate bill No. 453.

Mr. CHANDLER. I gave notice yesterday that at one o'clock to-day I should call up the Niagara ship-canal bill. Of course I cannot antagonize it with this bill, which is unfinished business, but I give notice that the moment this bill is passed I shall call up the Niagara ship-canal bill and antagonize it against any other measure that stands in its way.

TENURE OF OFFICE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (S. No. 453) to regulate the tenure of offices, the pending question being on the motion of Mr. SUMNER to amend the amendment agreed to as in Committee of the Whole by adding to it the following additional section:

And be it further enacted, That all officers or agents, except clerks of Departments, now appointed by the President or by the head of any Department, whose salary or compensation, derived from fees or otherwise, exceeds $1,000 annually, shall be nominated by the President and appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and the term of all such officers or agents who have been appointed since the 1st day of July, 1866, either by the President or by the head of a Department, without the advice and consent of the Senate, shall expire on the last day of February, 1866.

Mr. SUMNER. It is only little more than a year ago that I felt it my duty to characterize a message of the President as "whitewashing." The message represented the condition of things in the rebel States as fair and promising when the prevailing evidence was directly the other way. Of course the message was "whitewashing," and this was a mild term for such a document. But you do not forget how certain Senators, horror-struck at this plainness, leaped forward to vindicate the President. Yesterday some of these same Senators, horror-struck again, leaped forward again in the same task. Time has shown that I was right on the former occasion. If anybody doubts that I was right yesterday I commend him to time. He will not be obliged to wait long. Meanwhile I shall insist always upon complete freedom of debate, and I shall exercise it. John Milton, in his glorious aspirations, said, "Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely above all liberties." Thank God, now that slave masters have been driven from this Chamber, such is the liberty of an American Senator! Of course there can be no citizen of a Republic too high for exposure, as there can be none too low for protection. The exposure of the powerful and the protection of the weak; these are not only invaluable liberties but commanding duties.

At last the country is opening its eyes to the actual condition of things. Already it sees that Andrew Johnson, who came to supreme power by a bloody accident, has become the successor of Jefferson Davis in the spirit by which he is governed and in the mischief he is inflicting on his country. It sees the President of the Rebellion revived in the President of the United States. It sees that the violence which took the life of his illustrious predecessor is now by his perverse complicity extending throughout the rebel States, making all who love the Union its victims and filling the land with tragedy. It sees that the war upon the faithful Unionists is still continued under his powerful auspices, without any distinction of color, so that all, both white and black, are sacrificed. It sees that he is the minister of discord, and not the minister of peace. It sees that, so long as his influence prevails, there is small chance of tranquillity, security, or reconciliation; that the restoration of prosperity in the rebel States, so much longed for, must be arrested; that the business of the whole country must be embarrassed, and that those conditions on which a sound currency depends must be postponed. All these things the country now sees. But indignation assumes the form of judgment when it is seen also that this incredible, unparalleled, and far-reaching mischief, second only to the Rebellion itself, of which it is a continuation, is invigorated and extended through a plain usurpation.

I know that the President sometimes quotes the Constitution and professes to carry out its behests. But this pretension is of little value. A French historian, whose fame as a writer is eclipsed by his greater fame as an orator, who has held important posts, and now in advancing years is still eminent in public life, has used words which aptly characterize an attempt like that of the President. I quote from the history of M. Thiers, while describing what is known as the resolution of the 18th Brumaire:

"When any one wishes to make a revolution or a counter-revolution it is necessary always to disguise the illegality as much as possible and to this end to use the terms of the Constitution in order to destroy it, and also the members of a Government in order to overturn it."

In this spirit the President has acted. He has bent Constitution, laws, and men to his arbitrary will, and has even invoked the Declaration of Independence for the overthrow of those Equal Rights which it so grandly proclaims.

In holding up Andrew Johnson to judgment, I do not dwell on his open exposure of himself in a condition of beastly intoxication while he was taking his oath of office; nor do I dwell on the maudlin speeches by which he has degraded the country as it was never degraded before; nor do I hearken to any reports of pardons sold, or of personal corruption. This is not the case against him, as I deem it my duty to present it in this argument. These things are bad, very bad; but they might not, in the opinion of some Senators, justify us on the present occasion. In other words, they might not be a sufficient reason for the amendment which I have moved.

But there is a reason which is ample. The President has usurped the powers of Congress on a colossal scale, and he has employed these usurped powers in fomenting the rebel spirit and awakening anew the dying fires of the rebellion. Though the head of the Executive, he has rapaciously seized the powers of the Legislative and made himself a whole Congress in defiance of a cardinal principle of republican government that each branch must act for itself without assuming the powers of the other; and, in the exercise of these illegitimate powers, he has become a terror to the good and a support to the wicked. This is his great and unpardonable offense, for which history must condemn him if you do not. He is a usurper, through whom infinite wrong has been done to his country. He is a usurper, who, promising to be a Moses, has become a Pharaoh. Do you ask for evidence? It is found in public acts which are beyond question. It is already written in the history of our country. And now in the maintenance of his usurpation he has employed the power of removal from office. Some, who would not become the partisans of his tyranny he has, according to his own language, "kicked out." Others are left, but silenced by this menace and the fate of their associates. Wherever any vacancy occurs, whether in the loyal or the rebel States, it is filled by the partisans of his usurpation. Other vacancies are created to provide for these partisans. I need not add that just in proportion as we sanction such nominations or fail to arrest them, according to the measure of our power, we become parties to his usurpation.

Here I am brought directly to the practical application of this simple statement. I have already said that the duty of the hour was in protection to the loyal and patriotic citizen against the President. Surely this cannot be doubted. The first duty of a Government is protection. The crowning glory of a Republic is that it leaves no man, however humble, without protection. Show me a man exposed to wrong and I show you an occasion for the exercise of all the power that God and the Constitution have given you. It will not do to say that the cases are too numerous, or that the remedy cannot be applied without interfering with a system handed down from our fathers, or worse still, that you have little sympathy with this suffering. This will not do. You must apply the remedy, or fail in duty. Especially must you apply it when, as on the present occasion, this wrong is part of an enormous usurpation in the interest of recent Rebellion.

The question then recurs, are you ready to apply the remedy, according to the measure of your powers? The necessity of this remedy may be seen in the rebel States, and also in the loyal States, for the usurpation is felt in both.

If you look at the rebel States, you will see everywhere the triumph of Presidential tyranny. There is not a mail which does not bring letters without number supplicating the exercise of all the powers of Congress against the President. There is not a newspaper which does not exhibit evidence that you are already tardy in this work of necessity. There is not a wind from that suffering region which is not freighted with voices of distress. And yet you hesitate.

I shall not be led aside to consider the full remedy for this usurpation; for it is not my habit to travel out of the strict line of debate. Therefore, I confine myself to the bill now under consideration, which is applicable alike to the loyal and the rebel States.

This bill has its origin in what I have already called the special duty of the hour, which is the protection of loyal and patriotic citizens against the President. In what I have already said I have shown the necessity of this protection. But the brutal language which the President has employed shows the spirit in which he has acted. The Senator from Indiana, [Mr. HENDRICKS,] whose judgment could not approve this brutality, doubted if the President had used it. Let me settle this question. Here is the National Intelligencer, always indulgent to the President. In its number for 13th of September last it thus reports what our Chief Magistrate said in a speech at St. Louis:

"I believe that one set of men have enjoyed the emoluments of office long enough, and they should let another portion of the people have a chance. [Cheers.] How are these men to be got out, [a voice] 'Kick 'em out,'—cheers and laughter, unless your Executive can put them out—unless you can reach them through the President? Congress says he shall not turn them out, and they are trying to pass laws to prevent it being done. Well, let me say to you, if you will stand by me in this action—[cheers]—if you will stand by me in trying to give the people a fair chance—to have soldiers and citizens to participate in these offices—God be willing, I will kick them out; I will kick them out just as fast as I can." [Great cheering.]

Such language as this is without precedent. Coming from the President, it is a declaration of "policy" which it is your duty to counteract; and in this duty you must make a precedent, if need be.

The bill now before the Senate arises from this necessity. Had Abraham Lincoln been spared to us there would have been no occasion for this bill, which the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] has shaped with so much care, and now presses so earnestly. It is a bill arising from the exigency of the hour. As such it is to be judged. But it does not meet the whole case. Undertaking to give protection, it gives it to a few only, instead of the many. It provides against the removal, appointment, or employment of persons whose offices, according to existing law and Constitution, are held by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Its special object is to vindicate the power of the Senate over the offices committed to it according to existing law and Constitution. Thus vindicating the power of the Senate it does something indirectly for the protection of the citizen. In this respect it is a beneficent measure, and I shall be glad to vote for it.

The amendment which I have moved goes further in the same direction. It provides that all agents and officers now appointed by the President, or by the head of a Department, shall be appointed only by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; and it further proceeds to vacate all such appointments made since 1st July last past, so as in a certain measure to arrest the recent process of "kicking out." This proposition is simple enough; and I insist that it is necessary, unless you are willing to leave fellow-citizens without protection against tyranny. Really the case is so plain that I do not like to argue it, and yet you will pardon me if I advert to certain objections which have been made.

We have been told that the number of persons it would bring before the Senate is such that it would clog and embarrass the public business; in other words, that we have not time to deal with so many cases. This is a strange argument. Because the victims are numerous, therefore, we are to fold our hands and let the sacrifice proceed. But I insist that just in proportion to the number is the urgency of your duty. Every victim has a voice, and when these voices count by thousands you have no right to turn away and say, "these are too numerous for the attention of the Senate." This is my answer to the objection founded on numbers.

But this is not all. You did not shrink during the war from the numerous nominations of military officers, counting by thousands; nor did you shrink from the numerous nominations of naval officers, counting by thousands. The power over these nominations you never relaxed, and I know well you never will relax. You know that, even if unable to consider carefully every case, yet the power over them enables you to interpose your veto on any improper nomination. The power of the Senate is a warning against tyranny in the Executive. But it is difficult to see any strong reason for this power in the case of the Army and Navy which is not applicable also to civil officers. This I should say in tranquil times; but there is another reason peculiar to the hour. Even if in tranquil times I were disposed to leave the appointing power as it is, I am not disposed now.

Then, again, we are told that we must not abandon the system of our fathers. I have already answered this objection precisely, in saying that, whatever may have been the system of the fathers, it is inadequate for the present hour. But I am not satisfied that the proposition moved by me is inconsistent with the system of the fathers. The officers of the internal revenue did not exist then, and the inferior officers of the customs were few in number and with small emoluments. But all district attorneys and marshals, even if their salary was no more than $200, were subject to the confirmation of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. And so they are yet.

Mr. SUMNER. And so they are yet, the Senator reminds me, and justly; but can the Senator doubt that if at the time when those officers were made subject to the confirmation of the Senate, weighers and gaugers and inspectors had been as well paid as they are now that they too would have been brought under the control of this body? I cannot.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think they would.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator does not think they would.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The reason was that those offices of marshals and district attorneys were considered in early times to be invested with a supposed degree of respectability, honor, and responsibility connected with the duties to be performed, and not in respect to the mere price which was paid to the persons for performing them. So the collectors of customs, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, were authorized to appoint most of their subordinates; the Postmaster General was authorized to appoint all of his, it being supposed that that class of offices requiring only a low degree of skill and not involving large public trusts, either in respect to administration or in respect to the pecuniary consideration to be received, might properly be left to the heads of Departments. I think that was the rule which governed the discrimination which was made.

Mr. SUMNER. But even if the Senator does not accept the view which I now present on the probable course of our fathers, he cannot resist the argument that, whatever may have been the old system, we must act now in the light of present duties. I repeat, a system good for our fathers may not be good for this hour, which is so full of danger.

Then, again, we are told, with something of indifference if not of levity, that it is not the duty of the Senate to look after the "bread and butter" of office-holders. This is a familiar way of saying that these small cases are not worthy of occupying the Senate. Not so do I understand our duties. There is no case so small as not to be worthy of occupying the Senate; especially if in this way you can save a citizen from oppression and weaken the power of an oppressor.

Something has been said about the curtailment of the executive power; and the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] has even argued against the amendment moved by me as conferring upon the President additional powers. This is strange. The effect of this amendment is, by clear intendment, to take from the President a large class of nominations and bring them within the control of the Senate. Thus it is obviously a curtailment of executive power, which I insist has become our bounden duty. The old resolution of the House of Commons, moved by Mr. Dunning, is applicable here: "The power of the Crown has increased, is increasing, and ought to be diminished." In this spirit we must put a bit in the President, who is now maintaining an illegitimate power by removals from office.

We are in the midst of a crisis. On one side is the President and on the other the people. It is the old question between prerogative and Parliament which occupied our English fathers. But the form it now takes is grander than ever before. In this controversy I am with the people and against the President. I have great faith in the people; but I have no faith in the President. Here, sir, I close what I have to say at this time. But before I take my seat, you will pardon me if I read a brief lesson, which seems as if written for the hour. The words are as beautiful as emphatic:

"The dogmas of the quiet past are inadequate to the stormy present. The occasion is piled high with difficulty, and we must rise with the occasion. As our case is new, so we must think anew and act anew. We must disenthrall ourselves and then we shall save our country."

These are the words of Abraham Lincoln. They are as full of vital force now as when he uttered them. I entreat you not to neglect the lesson. Learn from its teaching how to save our country.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not rise to prolong the debate on this amendment more than a few moments; but I think it right to say, in reply to my friend from Massachusetts, for whose opinions upon fundamental questions I have always entertained the highest respect, that I think upon reflection he will himself admit by and by that there are many theories which are absolutely perfect in themselves that cannot be carried into practice. There are many things that it would be exceedingly desirable to do if, as human nature goes and as human organizations are, they could be actually effected. It would be highly desirable if the will of the people of this country could be carried into the remotest detail of the Government, because that is the fundamental theory. It is, in theory, the duty of the hour in all democratic governments that the people's will should go to the uttermost artery and vein of the administration of a people's Government; but every man in his senses knows perfectly well that no such chimera can be carried into practice. The people are numerous. They cannot act individually or collectively together as a body. They must select their chief agents. Their chief agents must select subordinates, and those subordinates again must have more or less discretion in selecting the agencies which, under them, are to carry out the practical operations of the business of the Government.

Now, the question on the amendment of my friend is simply this: first, whether it be desirable for the President and the Senate of the United States to occupy their time, no matter whether they are in opposition or in accord, in discussing the particular merits of A against B for a night-watchman in the city of New York or for an inspector of customs in the city of Boston.

Mr. SUMNER. The Senator does not intend to misrepresent me; but he knows there is no such proposition before us.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I know that there is such a proposition before the Senate. The proposition before the Senate is the written amendment proposed by my friend from Massachusetts, and that makes a sweeping provision for every civil officer under the Government of the United States, except the clerks in the Departments, who is appointed by the head of a Department. If my friend will look at the law—

Mr. SUMNER. Let me correct the Senator.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. The language is, "all persons now appointed by the President or any head of a Department." If a night-watchman is appointed by the head of a Department the Senator is right; if he is not appointed by the head of a Department he is not right.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Exactly. My friend has stated the point of difference between us precisely. If a night-watchman is appointed by the head of a Department then he comes within the operation of the amendment; if he is not, he does not.

Mr. SUMNER. That is, if his pay is upward of $1,000 a year.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly. Now, I submit to my friend from Massachusetts whether or not the Secretary of the Treasury is the head of a Department? I believe he is.

Mr. SUMNER. Yes.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, I refer him to the law, and it may be called almost the fundamental law—it is the fundamental law of customs—which has stood from 1799 to this day, which makes it the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury, the head of the department of customs, on the nomination of the collector or the surveyor or the naval officer, as it may be, of the port, to appoint all the subordinates, and he does—

Mr. SUMNER. Will the Senator allow me to read the precise text?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. SUMNER. I have it before me, the statute of 1799. It is:

"That the collector shall, with the approbation of the principal officer of the Treasury Department, employ proper persons as weighers, gaugers, measurers, and inspectors at the several ports within his district."

There it is. The collector shall do this with the approbation of the principal officer of the Treasury Department. What is the thing to be done? He shall employ proper persons as weighers, gaugers, measurers, and inspectors; nothing more.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, if my friend will allow me to instruct him a little—and it is very rare that I or any other man can have that opportunity, and I say it in sincerity—let me inform my friend that a night-watchman in the city of New York and in the city of Boston, or wherever he may happen to be in the customs service, is an inspector, and is appointed as such, and his business is to inspect and watch over vessels during the night, and so he is called a night-watchman. There is not any such legal officer known to the law by the name of night-watchman that I know of.

Mr. SHERMAN. If my friend will allow me, I will state that under the Constitution it is clear that Congress has no power to confer upon any one but the President, the heads of Departments, or the courts of law, the power of appointing officers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That I stated the other day.

Mr. SHERMAN. By the Constitution we must confine it to the President of the United States, the courts of law, and the heads of Departments; and we have no right to confer it on the heads of bureaus. We attempted to do so, and the point was made, and we had to change the law in the case of assistant assessors.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was about to refer to that, as I referred to it the other day. We have no power to place it in anybody else. Therefore, as I said I think yesterday or the day before, every officer who is an officer by law, whatever he may be, must be appointed and is appointed either by the President with the advice and consent of the Senate, by the President alone, by the heads of Departments, or by the courts of law; and there the list is exhausted; there is no other authority for appointment in any other way.

Now, to return. As I said before, a night-watchman (if my friend will allow me to tell him his error) is an inspector, and he is appointed as such. I know personally what the practice in the Department is about such appointments. Every appointment of that description is made in the form of a nomination by the collector of the port or the surveyor, who may have charge under the law of some particular branch of it, to the Secretary of the Treasury in writing. "I nominate John Smith," or whoever it may be, "to be an inspector of customs." If John Smith meets the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury he is sworn and examined and appointed, and is detailed to duty as a night-watchman or a day inspector or whatever it may be.

Now, then, the point is, whether it is wise, whether it is one of the duties of the hour, one of the high and solemn duties of the hour, of which we have been told so much, that we should descend, as I say it is descending, from the position of attending to many high duties of the hour that do surround us, to go into these small offices, that have no special trust or responsibility commensurate with our attention at all, and undertake to wage a warfare with the President or with the heads of Departments as to whether A or B should be the person employed; because, whether it is A or B, either is a citizen of the United States, and either, considered in himself as a citizen, is as much entitled to hold the office as the other. I agree with my friend that I vastly prefer that the President of the United States should appoint Republicans. My prejudices, if they are to be called prejudices—my judgment, as I should call it—leads me in that direction; but I do say that when we have a measure of this description under consideration, which involves the privileges of the Senate and is intended to readjust the true equilibrium of the departments of the Government, we should not imperil such a measure by going into these doubtful questions of expediency which divide our own friends and jeopardize the success of the whole.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, in the deliberations of the Convention by which the Constitution was adopted, the result was that it was supposed to be better for the public interest and for the public liberty that the appointing power should be vested in the President alone. As far as the appointing power is concerned there has never been a doubt that the decision of the Convention was a correct one; and I have yet to learn that the Government by experience has been found to be less well administered, as far as its administration depends upon the manner in which the appointing power has been executed, by the fact that that power is vested in the President. I do not understand the honorable member from Massachusetts as denying that that theory is the wisest. His amendment is proposed, and he maintains it, upon the ground that it is called for by the particular character of the present incumbent of the presidential office; and he has thought proper to deal with that officer in terms which I am sure upon reflection hereafter his judgment will not approve. He has almost in words said that it ought to be taken from him because he has proved himself to be an enemy of his country, because he has proved himself to be a usurper.

In the particular condition in which we are placed—for we are obliged to look at what is occurring in another branch of the legislative department—I should have hoped that the honorable member from Massachusetts would have seen that it was not proper at this time, if under any circumstances it could be proper, to indulge in such epithets as against the President of the United States. A formal resolution has been offered in that branch looking to the impeachment of the President for high crimes and misdemeanors. If that impeachment shall be ordered by the House, we are to be the judges to decide whether he is guilty or innocent; and I should therefore have hoped that neither the honorable member from Massachusetts nor any other member of the Senate would in advance not merely express his opinion hypothetically, but express it decidedly, as justified by facts which are notorious. What sort of a trial, as far as that particular Senator is concerned, would the President of the United States have should he be impeached for being an enemy to his country, for being a usurper, either of which, in the contemplation of the Constitution, is a high crime? If upon the trial of such an impeachment that right, which the common law secures to every citizen or subject where the common law prevails, of having a fair tribunal to decide upon his case applied, the honorable Senator from Massachusetts ought to be, and I suppose would be, challenged for cause; and in what attitude would that place him, or either of us, if we were liable to be challenged upon the same ground?

Suppose we all went on, following the authority of the honorable member from Massachusetts, and expressed the same opinion: what would the world say? Suppose that without hearing the defense, in advance, without remembering the past conduct of the officer who is to be impeached, illustrated in the judgment of all until lately, at least, as perfectly patriotic, as evidencing a constant devotion to his country, we expressed an opinion that at least he had fallen from the duty which he owed to his country and to mankind, and had become a usurper and an enemy of his country: might not, to use the language of the common law, the whole array be challenged, and ought it not to be?

The Constitution, in the provision which says that a charge of that description is to be passed upon by the Senate of the United States, supposes that every individual member of the Senate will bring to the consideration of that question a mind as white as paper, upon which nothing is written in the way of judgment; and yet my friend from Massachusetts, urged, as I think, by what has occurred in the past, unconsciously to himself, having been dealt with improperly upon one occasion by this officer, has suffered his feelings, in my judgment, to lead him astray, to pronounce sentiments in this Chamber to-day which will render it improper in him to sit as a judge upon such a trial.

Sir, the President of the United States has done things which I do not approve, and he has omitted to do things which I could have hoped he would have done.

Mr. SUMNER. May I interrupt my friend there for one moment? What right have I to know that the President is to be impeached? How can I know it? And let me add to that, even if I could know it, there can be no reason in that why I should not argue the measure directly before the Senate and present such considerations as seem to me to be proper, founded on the misconduct of that officer.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I have not called the honorable member from Massachusetts to order. I trusted that his own good sense, or what was due to himself, to the Senate and the country, would itself have been a sufficient call to order. I say to the Senator now that he is bound to know, not that the President will be impeached, but that he may be impeached, because he knows that there is now a proposition in the House looking to that result; and in advance, without, as I think, the slightest necessity, he places himself out of the pale of his judges by pronouncing, in the face of the public, that he has adjudged and condemned already.

During the Presidency of General Jackson the Senate of the United States had before it certain resolutions couched in such phrases as implied as against him the charge of being an enemy of his country or a usurper. He sent in his protest. I invoke the honorable member from Massachusetts to read that protest again and see how it can be answered. He protested against it upon a ground not as strong as that upon which I now place what I suppose to be the erroneous and misjudged conduct of the honorable member from Massachusetts, upon the ground that the matters charged in the resolutions were offenses impeachable. It was perfectly well known that there was to be no impeachment of him in that House of Representatives. They sided with him. And one who might have been termed the leader of the Senate, one by whom I think the original resolutions were drafted, one who towered high among his fellows, and stood equally high in the estimation of his country was so forcibly struck with the objection that he changed the phraseology of his resolutions.

But I submit to the Senate and to the honorable member that upon a mere question whether it is advisable to vest in anybody else but the President the appointments to which his amendment refers, it was wholly unnecessary to inquire into the character of the President. The honorable member was here, I believe, during the whole administration of Mr. Lincoln, and if any member of the Senate had more influence with that departed statesman and officer than himself I am not aware of it. I had reasons to believe, satisfactory to my own mind, and I am sure the honorable Senator will not contradict me, that his judgment had not only an influence but a controlling influence upon the judgment of the incumbent of the office at that time. He applauded him. It is not for me to say the applause was not well merited. He justified all that that officer did. It is not for me to say that the justification was not well founded. But at the moment that he was applauding and justifying the acts of Mr. Lincoln, he knew, or might have known, that in exercising the power of appointment he had turned out twice as many officers as have been turned out of office by the existing President; but yet not a word of censure came from the honorable member from Massachusetts, or from any other quarter, except, perhaps, from the friends of those who were dismissed. Why? Because the power was properly vested in the Executive, and because in the exercise of his power the friends of the honorable member had been put in, and those who were politically hostile to the honorable member had been, to use a phrase which he is about to make classic, "kicked out."

Mr. SUMNER. It would be impossible to make that classic.

Mr. JOHNSON. Why, almost everything in that way is possible that the honorable member from Massachusetts undertakes to accomplish. Everybody may dispute for himself, until the authority of the honorable member is brought to its support, the poetry of the phrase; but if he lends it his sanction, as he has done now twenty or thirty times and more, and talks to the Senate from hour to hour and day to day of officers being "kicked out," it will become a household word. What did the President mean by "kicking out?" Does the honorable member suppose he really intended to "kick them out?"

Mr. SUMNER. He said so.

Mr. JOHNSON. Did he mean to carry it out literally? All that he meant was that he would turn them out. But at last the honorable member is quarreling with a word used by the President, which he thinks was used in bad taste, but which was used merely for the purpose of saying that he would turn out the incumbents wherever he thought it proper to do so.

Now, upon what ground did he put his duty to turn them out, or to use the presidential phrase and the Massachusetts phrase, "kick them out?" It was upon a doctrine which swept over the country at one time—"rotation in office." A large majority of the people of the United States thought—unwisely as I believe—that the people individually had a right from time to time to participate in the patronage of the Government; that there should be no life offices; and that the only way in which they could share in the patronage was upon the doctrine of enforcing a rotation in office; and upon that theory Congress, by a vote nearly unanimous, provided that the tenure of office of almost all officers should be for a period only of four years, so as to leave the offices vacant and give the President for the time the authority to put in his own friends without "kicking out" his opponents.

Mr. President, as I have already stated, the President of the United States has said a great many things that I could wish, for his sake and for the sake of the office, had not been said. But he is by nature impetuous. Brought up, springing from the humblest ranks in life, he has been subjected to turmoils from time to time to which perhaps he would not have been subjected, or into which he would not have entered if he had been educated in the colleges which have given to my friend from Massachusetts the celebrity which he holds in the estimation of the learned. He has been on the stump in Tennessee, meeting men who spoke not in the language of the classics, but in a language which shows what their feelings are for the moment, and the stronger the terms are that they use the better they are liked by themselves and generally by their auditors. The President has fallen into that habit; he exhibited it on the 22d February, and neither the honorable member from Massachusetts nor any other member of the Senate nor any citizen of the country regretted more than I did the exhibition of it upon that occasion. He exhibited it upon the journey which during the summer he made through the West. Admit it all to have been in bad taste, admit it all to have been censurable in the judgment of men of taste, even in the individual man, and above all admit it not to have been in accordance with the dignity of the office of which he was the incumbent: does that prove or tend to prove that he is designedly untrue to his country?

If the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, with all the firmness which may characterize him or which belongs to his character, had accompanied the President of the United States when he left this Chamber in the spring of 1861 on his journey home, and met with the difficulties and been surrounded by the dangers which threatened even his life, even he might have quailed. The President did not. After hurling his anathemas in language which struck the patriotic heart of the country with delight against the men who were plotting treason in this Chamber, just as they were about to leave for their respective States in order to consummate the treason, he went through the dangers of his travel home, reached that home, and there, surrounded by men who sympathized with the South, and, whether with good or bad reasons, hated the North, was charged with treason to his section and was in imminent peril. He kept on in the even course of his way; he was patriotic to the last, defied the men around him, predicted what the result of the contest would be in which they had involved the nation, and emerging out of it he was selected by the political friends of the member from Massachusetts for the second office in the gift of the people, and he was elected. What has he done since? He has done two things: he has, first, sought to reorganize the States that seceded precisely in the same manner, upon the same terms, as his predecessor was seeking to reorganize them; he has, secondly, consistent himself with the principles upon which he was elected by the people to the office, desired to have brought into the Union the States that once were in rebellion, as his predecessor did, and he is met with opposition here and in the other branch of Congress.

What was he to do? What would any man have done in his place who was honest in that conviction; and we have no right to doubt his honesty. He would have used the power of appointment; and almost any other man than himself would have used it to a much greater extent than he has done. What else has he done? In the exercise of a right in words conferred upon him he has refused to give his assent to several bills passed by Congress; he had a right to do it. To deprive him of the exercise of his judgment upon bills which Congress may pass from time to time is to take from him the very power which the Constitution confers. There is no treason in his doing that. In some cases his veto has been effective; in other cases it has been overruled. Has he not submitted? Who can with truth allege that he has failed to give an honest support to the acts of Congress which have been passed in opposition to his veto? I think no one can, and I do not know that any one has attempted to do it. The Constitution providing that if upon reconsideration the two Houses of Congress give votes which make a bill a law in spite of the veto, he has submitted to it as a law as a good citizen.

Whether in speaking before the people he has sinned against good taste, whether he has been provoked by political enemies who themselves or through their instruments have endeavored to provoke him to say things which a President of the United States should not have said, is one question; but he will be false to the history of the man's life, above all false to the history of that part of his life which has been passed since the rebellion commenced and in anticipation of the rebellion, who will charge him with not being true to his duty to the country according to his understanding of it. Unfortunately some would have us believe, but I believe in the end fortunately for himself upon the true policy in reference to the States that have been in rebellion, he differs from those who were instrumental in placing him in power; he does not differ from his immediate predecessor. Is he to be condemned for that? Reared in the humblest walks of life, having a trade as contradistinguished from a profession, not calculated, one would suppose, to educate him for the Presidency of the United States, the highest office, as I think, in the gift of the world, he has in every period of his career, from the time he first entered into public life to the present hour, never been charged with being faithless to his country until he happened to differ, not with his immediate predecessor, but happened to differ from what the party who elected him thought ought to be the policy of the Government as administered by the Executive. He is about to retire to private life; and when his history shall be written, as written it will be after the passions of the hour have subsided and reason shall have resumed its sway, the biographer and the historian will say that no President of the United States ever labored more zealously to cure the wounds which the rebellion had inflicted upon us, or had a more earnest desire to place the Government of the United States upon a footing which would enable it to stand during all time the honor and admiration of the world, as not only sufficient to work for us a national renown but that greater virtue of securing to every individual citizen the rights which the Constitution and nature and nature's God conferred upon him.

Sir, I am no party friend of the President of the United States in the strict sense of that term. He has done things which I disapprove, and I have no doubt he will do so in the future; but that he has ever erred consciously, that he has ever usurped power knowingly, that he has ever entertained a thought inimical to the true interest or honor of the country, I have never been as yet able to believe, and I have no reason to suppose I shall ever be made to believe. He has fallen in the estimation of his party, not upon any ground assumed by the party at the time he was elected; not upon any ground of policy pursued by his immediate predecessor, who died amid the lamentations of the whole country and almost of the world; but because a new state of things has arisen since in which he differs from the men by whom he was elevated to power. In my judgment, exercising the privilege which every Senator on this floor has and every American citizen has of having a judgment upon all the political questions of the day, I think that so far from sinning in the course which he has adopted, he would with the opinions which have governed him through his life have sinned if he had adopted a different course. What he has done has obviously been done with a view to bring about a complete restoration of the Union, to have all the States together as they were when Washington presided over its destinies in the executive chair. He may be mistaken—personally I think he is not, but that is a matter of little or no moment; that is a matter of individual judgment—he may be mistaken in the policy which he has adopted; but as I believe in my existence there is no man living within the broad limits of the United States who will more rejoice than the present incumbent of the presidential chair when peace and harmony shall have been restored and we shall again be as we were before, brothers in everything.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, the Senator from Massachusetts has thought fit to animadvert upon the President of the United States, I must confess in rather strong terms. I do not rise for the purpose of supporting that arraignment or for the purpose of defending the President against it. Upon that subject I have only one or two remarks to make. The first is that what he said was either in order or it was out of order. If that question had been raised it would have been determined by the Chair, subject to no revision whatever except that of the Senate. That question was not raised, and there is but one question now to raise upon those remarks, and that is they were either just or unjust. Upon that question I suppose the Senator is responsible to his constituents and to the country. Upon that question the Senator from Maryland and every other Senator has an undoubted right to be heard here or elsewhere. The Senator from Maryland evidently thinks those remarks were unjust. He was quite at liberty, as I think, to assert and maintain that proposition; but it did strike me that the Senator from Maryland, in his zeal, if I may so say, to defend the President of the United States, has undertaken in advance to attack the character of the high court of impeachment, and he has done that in the face of his own reminder to us that it is barely possible, it is one of the events which the future has possibly in store for us, that the President himself may be arraigned before this court of impeachment for trial. The Senator says that the President or any other party who may be arraigned before that court is entitled to a candid, to an impartial, to an unbiased tribunal; that every mind coming to the consideration of that trial should be as white paper on which no impressions are made whatever; and he argues that because of the opinions which the Senator from Massachusetts has advanced here he would be open to challenge.

Sir, if it should happen that the President of the United States should be presented before this court upon the address of the House of Representatives, I suppose the Senator from Maryland, in common with the whole country, would desire that this court should hold that position in the public confidence which would entitle its verdict, when its verdict should be pronounced, to the respect of the country; and I therefore wish to remind the Senator and the Senate that this Senate is and must be the court to try that impeachment if it should come, for the Constitution expressly declares that the Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments; there can be no other tribunal than the Senate. And it is also to be remembered that the Senate is by the express command of the Constitution to be composed of two Senators from each State, and it is to be remembered that Massachusetts is a State, and it is to be remembered that the Senator from that State who has just addressed the Senate is one of those Senators representing that State; so that whatever may be his opinions he must of necessity be a member of the court to try that impeachment.

The Senator from Maryland seems to think it of the utmost importance that each Senator should be unbiased. If it be so, I suppose he should not only not have any opinions unfriendly to the President but he should not have any friendly to him. The Senator from Massachusetts has advanced the idea that the President has become an enemy to his country. The Senator from Maryland says that that is a high crime, and if he be guilty of it he ought to be impeached, and upon that question the Senator from Massachusetts ought not to act because he has already formed an opinion. Mr. President, I suppose there is no member of the Senate but what has an opinion on that question one way or another. I think it will be the judgment of the Senate, in view of the debate which has already been listened to, that the Senator from Massachusetts does not seem to be any more firmly impressed with the idea that the President is the enemy of his country than the Senator from Maryland seems possessed with the contrary opinion. It does not disqualify a Senator from acting in this court that he has an opinion on one side of the question unless it disqualifies a Senator who has an opinion on the other side. An opinion of one kind, it seems to me, disqualifies one as much as an opinion of the other kind. And I suppose there is, as I said before, no member of the Senate but has an opinion on that very question one way or the other. It may be that every one of these opinions is not so obstinate but that it can be controlled by testimony. That may be the case with the opinion advanced here by the Senator from Maryland, and we have no authority for saying that it is not the case also with the opinion advanced by the Senator from Massachusetts.

But I suppose that not only to be the condition of the sentiment in this Senate touching the present President of the United States, but I suppose we never had a President who was not in communication with a Senate divided upon just that question, some thinking he was an enemy of the country and others thinking that he was not; and I respectfully submit, therefore, that the Senator from Massachusetts will be competent to try an impeachment if it should be sent here against the President as I conceive the Senator from Maryland would be competent to try that question in spite of the opinions which he has pronounced here.

Mr. LANE. If it is not considered out of order I will take a very few moments to attempt to direct the attention of the Senate to the question before the body. [Laughter.] I shall not undertake to anticipate a state of things where the President of the United States shall be regularly impeached by the lower House and where the members of this grave body shall be his triers. I know not what the result of such an investigation may be, but I hope we shall all be prepared to decide that question upon its merits whenever, if at all, it shall be presented. But I desire now to enter my protest against this doctrine that the freedom of debate in the Senate of the United States shall be or can be curtailed. I know by the parliamentary law that it is out of order to speak disrespectfully of a coordinate branch of the Government. The meaning of it is that when it is not necessary for the purposes of the debate that we shall travel out of the record to denounce improperly a coordinate branch of the Government it is out of order to do so. But here is a bill proposing to restrict the power of removal of the President, based upon the supposition that there has been an abuse, a shameful abuse of the power of removal and appointment. That is precisely the subject-matter before the Senate; and every Senator, under his responsibility to his constituents, his conscience, and his God, may characterize the conduct of the President in such language precisely as he believes to be fit and proper, having no other possible restraint in the law or in the Constitution.

We are called upon to act on the subject of the abuse of the executive patronage. That is the subject now before the Senate. If it be not so, the whole object of the bill is aimless and purposeless. And if we are to be tied here, if a padlock is to be placed upon our mouths here, we have a despotism instead of a Republic, and this high body, the grand inquest of the nation, has no right to characterize tyranny and usurpation as they should be characterized! We may not travel beyond the verge and scope of proper debate to denounce a coordinate branch of the Government; but when it comes legitimately within the proper discharge of our duties we may, we must, we are recreant if we do not, use fitting terms to characterize what we consider an abuse of the appointing power.

Now, Mr. President, what is contemplated by this bill? Simply to restrain and restrict the unlimited power of removal now claimed by the President of the United States. This has always been a doubtful question. It was raised in the First Congress of the United States and decided in the Senate only by the casting vote of John Adams, the then Vice President. From that time to this the power has been doubted by distinguished lawyers. The power has been supported also, I admit, by distinguished lawyers; and perhaps the Supreme Court alone can determine who is right and who is wrong as to the construction of the Constitution on this point. But this bill steers clear of all possible constitutional objections. There are certain officers known to and recognized by the Constitution, whose duties are defined by the Constitution, whose necessary qualifications for office are defined, whose tenure of office is defined. Congress has no right to fix additional conditions or qualifications or a different tenure of office for these constitutional officers; but every other officer in the civil or military administration is subject to the jurisdiction of Congress, and they have a perfect right to fix the tenure of office, the mode of appointment, the duration of the term, and the compensation. This bill does not propose to touch a single constitutional officer, but simply to provide a different tenure of office for those officers provided for by law and whose only existence is under the statute law. You have breathed the breath of life into their bodies. The Constitution never called them to be and to exist. It is your action and yours alone under which they exist, and the Congress alone can fix the tenure of their offices.

This bill by its first section provides that certain officers; excepting the Cabinet of the President, shall hold their office for a certain time and until their successors shall have been confirmed by a vote of the Senate. That is substantially the first section of this bill. We might, if we chose, apply this principle to the Cabinet officers of the President of the United States. I know heretofore the doctrine has been held that Cabinet officers stood in a relation to the President so confidential that he alone should be consulted in their choice; and except perhaps in two instances no Cabinet officer has been rejected by the Senate; but if we choose we may fix the tenure of their offices. We have as much power over them as we have over an inferior clerk. They are only head clerks of the President, echoing his wishes and will; and the moment their action becomes objectionable to him they are removed. Such is the theory of our Government, and such is the practice that has always prevailed. I do not know that it would be expedient now to embrace the Cabinet officers in this bill; but I am willing to go even to that extent. I think, however, they may be properly left out of this bill as proposed by the Senator from Vermont, and let the President have the absolute power of appointment and the absolute power of removal in reference to them, and I do not care how soon he begins to exercise that power of removal.

What furthermore is contemplated by this bill? That where an officer during the recess of Congress shall be shown to be incompetent or unfaithful the President shall have a right to suspend him from office, and the duties shall then be discharged by the person empowered by law to perform those duties in case of a vacancy, and that the President shall report that suspension, with his reasons for it, to the Senate of the United States at their next session. I see nothing wrong in that. The law in most instances already designates the proper person to discharge the duties when the incumbent shall be incompetent from absence or any other cause. I see nothing wrong in giving the President power to suspend for good cause and allowing the functions to be discharged by the persons defined in law in other cases, or even to allowing a new appointment of a temporary character in such a case.

Then comes the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts, more wide-sweeping in its scope than any provision contemplated by the bill; and that is that all officers whose annual compensation is more than a thousand dollars shall be appointed by the President subject to the approval or satisfaction of the Senate. That applies, I understand, to all officers who are not properly constitutional officers; those I suppose we may not touch. Excluding the Supreme Court, the President, and Vice President, and according to the provisions of this bill the Cabinet officers, all others shall be subject to confirmation by the Senate of the United States. When this proposition was moved a few days ago upon a pension bill which I had the honor to introduce, I opposed it as an amendment to that bill; but I now support it. From my heart of hearts I support it as a proposition to be attached to this bill, to which it is properly germane. I would make all these officers subject to confirmation by the Senate of the United States. We must lodge discretion somewhere, either with the Executive or with the Senate. In the light of passing events I prefer to trust the Senate. I have confidence in the Senate.

But gentlemen here upon this floor echo the objection of the President in his recent veto message, that danger to public liberty comes from popular representation. Sir, if you will read the history, ancient and modern, of the Old World, you will find that popular liberty has been in no single instance stricken down by popular representation. Look to the revolution in England, look to the terrible French Revolution, look to the Greek republics, and to the republics of the middle ages, and you will find that it was the tyrants, the dictators, the self-constituted usurpers of authority who overthrew public liberty. I deny that the great danger in our institutions results from popular representation. If that be true, all history is a lie; if that be true, your Government is a fraud and a cheat and the people are not capable of self-government. But that argument is used by the President and repeated here. There is no danger from popular representation. Under our theory of government the only danger is that the popular voice may not be heard, and constitutionally heard.

I would not strip the President of the United States of a single one of his constitutional powers. But, sir, what are the two powers now threatening the liberties of the people? They are the veto power and the indiscriminate use of the power of removals from and appointments to office. The people, thank God, have disposed of the argument arising out of the veto power, and we have now a two-thirds majority in each House of Congress. The loyal voice of this country is heard. By the echo of the previous decision of the people the veto power is no longer regarded, although such is the frequency of its exercise that it has wrought a secret and almost silent revolution in the country, so that now when we look to measures of legislation we do not inquire as to majorities, but whether we can secure a two-thirds vote and overrule the action of the President.

So much, then, for the argument attempted to be drawn from the assumption, as I conceive wholly unsupported in history, that the danger to public liberty results, not from the power exercised by the king or the emperor or the despot or the President, but results from the tyranny of the majority. Sir, if you will cause to pass before you in procession the grand nations of ancient and modern times, if you will open the mausoleum where reposes the history of the past and the dead of ages, you will find that popular representation has never threatened popular liberty in any country upon earth.

Gentlemen tell us, however, that there is no evil here to be remedied, and consequently no necessity for a new law on this subject. Gentlemen tell us that the removals have been few and far between, and that the President in the main has selected men for office who voted for himself and Mr. Lincoln in 1864. I know not how it may be in other sections; but in my own State I do know that two collectors of internal revenue have been appointed by Mr. Johnson who were among the most able and efficient supporters of McClellan and Pendleton during the controversy of 1864. I know of those two instances; there may be hundreds of others, and perhaps there are; but the argument is that he has not always appointed Democrats to office, that he has sometimes, carrying out the sentiment of one of his Cabinet ministers, appointed men to eat his bread and butter who were ready to sell their principles for the sake of office. I regard that as more demoralizing in its character and tendency than the appointment of honest and upright Democrats.

Now, Mr. President, I desire to say a few words in reference to this question, so that I may be properly understood at home. We are told upon this floor that out of four million votes cast at the last elections eighteen hundred thousand were for the President's policy; and out of a vote of four millions there was a popular majority of only four hundred thousand in favor of the congressional policy; and that the eighteen hundred thousand who supported the policy of the President are a large minority who have a right to share in the patronage of the General Government.

Sir, our Government proceeds upon the theory of majorities. The majority have a right to rule. Heretofore when an Administration has come into power, as in the case of Mr. Lincoln, where the President has been in accord with his party, he has distributed the offices to his party friends. That system was introduced by General Jackson; as I believe, under the counsel—at least it was so stated—of Mr. Van Buren; and from that time to the present it has always been considered that upon the incoming of a new Administration there should be a change of officers, so to make them generally in accord with the Administration.

In 1860 Mr. Lincoln was elected President, and when he came into power in 1861 there was an extensive removal from office, but I believe not so extensive as there should have been; but he was in accord with his party, that party representing a constitutional majority of the people of the United States. Mr. Johnson, the present acting President of the United States, elected Vice President in 1864 upon the same ticket with Mr. Lincoln, comes into office and finds Mr. Lincoln's appointees in place, and he, for mere political and partisan purposes commences a general removal from office. Now, the question is who represents the majority of the people of the United States—the grand national Union Republican party which has sustained the country through five years of terrible war. Who represents that party, the President of the United States, or the Congress of the United States? To whom do the public offices belong, to the President or to the people? If they belong to the people, the people come only to be heard through the voice of their representatives in Congress. Do they belong to the President? If so, the grand battles and triumphs of the Revolution were fought in vain, for then we have a despotism more onerous and terrible than any despotism which has ground down the eastern nations.

But gentlemen say they should have a part of these offices. Who cast the eighteen hundred thousand votes that sustained the President at the last elections and who sustain him to-day? The Democratic party, who brought on this war, who are chargeable for every grave which furrows the battle-fields of the South; who are chargeable for the terrible convulsions which have shaken the country and threatened free government and free institutions upon the continent. They gave these eighteen hundred thousand votes, and they claim now to participate in the patronage of the Government. Who, furthermore, support "my policy?" Who stand beside the President to-day? Not only the Democratic party of the North, who in the Chicago convention resolved that the war for the Union thus far had been a failure, but the ten States in rebellion. They now support and sustain the policy of the President of the United States. I ask you, Mr. President, to look at the emergency now upon us, at the grand crisis through which we are now passing, in the terrible and lurid light of five years' civil war; look at it in the history of Libby prison and Salisbury and Andersonville, and you must recognize your right not only to protect loyal men here but loyal men everywhere.

Mr. President, I regret that I have injured a very fine voice in denouncing the outrages of the Democratic party for the last twenty years; and I am sorry that the state of my lungs is such that I cannot proceed either with satisfaction to myself or satisfaction to the Senate. I have only to repeat that I shall give my vote for this bill in its widest and most extensive scope, not for the purpose of striking down any proper constitutional power of the President, but with the firm determination to stand upon and assert every constitutional power of the Senate. There I stand and shall stand as long as I have the honor to be a member of this high body.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. HARRIS in the chair.) The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Massachusetts to the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SUMNER. Before the vote is taken I will amend my amendment, as it is within my power to do so, by striking out "$1,000" and substituting "$1,500."

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator has a right to modify his amendment, and it will be so modified.

Mr. SUMNER. I have made that change in deference to Senators about me, and especially yielding to the earnest argument of the Senator from Vermont, who was very much disturbed by the idea that the Senate would have to act upon inspectors. My experience in this body teaches me not to be disturbed at anything. I am willing to act on an inspector or a night-watchman; and if I could I would throw over him the shield of the Senate against the tyranny of the Executive. The Senator from Vermont would leave him a prey to that tyranny, so far as I can understand, for no other reason than because he is an inspector, an office of inferior dignity; and because also if we embrace all inspectors we shall have too much work to do. Sir, we are sent to the Senate to do work, and especially to surround the citizen with all possible safeguards. The duty of the hour is now as I have declared. It ought not to be postponed. Every day that it is postponed is to my mind a sacrifice of duty. Let us not, then, be deterred even by the humility of these officers or by their number; but whether humble or numerous let us embrace them within the protecting arms of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Only a single remark, sir. I do not think that in order to save these inspectors from what my friend seems to consider the dangerous clutches of the President we ought to neglect all the rest of the people of the country in protecting them by appropriate legislation. The Senator has now modified his amendment to make the limit $1,500; and the effect of that, without going into it any further than to point out one single effect, will be to take away from the confirmation of the Senate hundreds of deputy postmasters, as they are called, who are now required to be confirmed by the Senate, because according to the existing law where the salary of a deputy postmaster is $1,000 a year we have to act upon his nomination. The consequence will be that the Senator by this change will lose almost as many offices from the control of the Senate as he will get into it. He will throw the postmasters into the dangerous clutches of the Postmaster General, and will save a few inspectors. I hope that every friend of the real purpose of this bill will vote against the amendment.

Mr. SUMNER. Let me reply precisely to the Senator. He says that the proposition I have now made would throw certain postmasters within what he calls the clutches of the President. The language he employs is apt—within the clutches of the President. But he is mistaken; let him read the amendment and he will see that it is open to no such interpretation. My amendment is only applicable to those agents and officers who are now appointed by the President or by the head of a Department without the advice and consent of the Senate. All postmasters with $1,500 salary are now appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, Mr. President, but the law under which those appointments are made, as it now stands, is that all postmasters with a salary of $1,000 or upward shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. It is proposed to change the law by making the point of confirmation $1,500, and that of course will throw out all who receive less.

Mr. SUMNER. The point to which the Senator refers is made applicable only to officers now appointed by the President or the head of a Department without the advice and consent of the Senate. If $1,500 postmasters are in that category, then I admit that they fall within my amendment; but if they are not within that category then they do not fall within my amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I ask the Senator from Massachusetts if he will accept an amendment which proposes to submit all of these officers to the confirmation of the Senate? As I understand the proposition now it is that all officers appointed by the President whose salary amounts to $1,500 shall be submitted to the Senate for confirmation, and those appointed by the heads of Departments not.

Mr. SUMNER. No; the Senator does not read the amendment aright. It is that all agents or officers appointed by the President or by the head of a Department whose salary or emoluments, whether from fees or otherwise, amount to $1,500 per annum, shall be appointed hereafter by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and only in that way.

Mr. MORRILL. I do not know but that the amendment is susceptible of that construction, but I think it is not quite as clear as the Senator's statement. If, however, that is the view of it, I of course make no further suggestion.

Mr. SUMNER. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NORTON. I wish to state that I have paired off on this question with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. FOWLER.] If he were present he would vote for the amendment and I against it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Conness, Grimes, Harris, Howard, Howe, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cowan, Cragin, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Hendricks, Johnson, Nesmith, Patterson, Poland, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Van Winkle, Willey, and Williams—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Creswell, Davis, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Guthrie, Henderson, Kirkwood, McDougall, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Stewart, and Trumbull—15.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HOWE. I desire now to renew the amendment which I submitted while this bill was in Committee of the Whole, to strike out the words included within parenthesis in the third, fourth, and fifth lines of the first section, as follows:

Excepting the Secretaries of State, of the Treasury, of War, of the Navy, and of the Interior, the Postmaster General, and the Attorney General.

I tried the other day when this same question was before the Senate to submit my reasons for urging the amendment. I was conscious at the time that I made a very inadequate presentation of them; but I find the whole argument in a morning paper; and it is so complete and I find myself so utterly unable to answer it and so confident that no one else can answer it that I desire to produce it. It is a quotation in the paper from which I read, from the New York Herald:

"It is rumored this evening, in reference to Senator Cowan's appointment as minister to Austria, that an important position in the Cabinet, which it is confidently asserted has been tendered him, will influence in a great measure his decision in accepting or rejecting the appointment to a foreign mission. The portfolio of the Secretary of War is among the considerations which will induce him to remain."

No one has denied that our authority over this question of removing a Secretary of State is just as ample as it is over the removal of any other officer. If my amendment be adopted, then this portfolio will not operate at all to dissuade the gentleman alluded to in this paragraph from going to Austria. If my amendment is adopted, this portfolio will not, I take it, be given to the gentleman alluded to in this paragraph. Those who think that that change ought to be made I suppose will vote against this amendment. Having a very high opinion of the gentleman alluded to myself, so far as his personal character is concerned, I am compelled to say that I do not think that would be a good change to make for the interest of this country, and therefore I shall vote for the amendment, and I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. The reason assigned by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin certainly is a very unanswerable one indeed! What is it? A rumor. Where does it come from, who is responsible for it, and upon what authority is it based? A passage taken from a daily paper, that the portfolio of War may be tendered to the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania, who certainly has no superior as a statesman on this floor, if any in the country; and the action of the Senate of the United States is gravely invoked in behalf of an important amendment to this bill because, perhaps by the adoption of that amendment, the portfolio of War may not be tendered to the Senator from Pennsylvania! And that, too, sir, when, if that portfolio be tendered to that distinguished Senator, his confirmation will be in the hands of the Senate of the United States; and if the Senate of the United States forbid that confirmation no disaster can come to the country from such a tender as that to the Senator from Pennsylvania. The distinguished Senator from Wisconsin said he could not answer the argument which he himself read; in other words, he confessed that he could not answer an idle rumor, which I suppose is true.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Mr. President, I desire to state, in connection with what has been said, that my colleague is now absent from the Chamber, and is not himself able to take any notice of the introduction of a newspaper correspondent's speculation in the debates of this body. I desire also to state, as this point has been raised, that my colleague was nominated by the President of the United States for a position abroad without his knowledge. He had no information that such a nomination was proposed, no concern whatever in procuring it. He stands perfectly independent of the whole proceeding, having had no personal connection with it in any way whatever.

I must say, in addition to that, as to the statement by a newspaper correspondent upon a proposed location of my colleague hereafter in intimate relations with the President at home, I have no information whatever; but so far as my opinion can be formed from a knowledge of him, from a knowledge of the general circumstances of the case, I do not believe there is the slightest foundation for what is stated by the correspondent. Of course we may conjecture upon what may take place hereafter as we please. What I desire to say is that, so far as I know and believe, this statement by the correspondent is a vague, idle conjecture, belonging to a class of conjectures which I suppose find their way into the newspapers of the country from the fact that these newspaper correspondents are in want of material to make up the correspondence for which they are paid, and in the absence of definite and exact information to communicate to the newspapers with which they have the relation of correspondent they exercise their ingenuity for the purpose of feeding that popular love of excitement upon which newspaper circulation is to a great extent based.

I have said thus much because of the circumstance which I stated in rising: that the member of this body who was affected was not then present in the Chamber.

Mr. HOWE. I trust it is not necessary for me to disavow any purpose of reflecting upon the character of the distinguished gentleman whose name is introduced in this paragraph. It is not necessary for me to disavow any such purpose, because I did not indulge in any such reflection, had none to indulge in. I have not a feeling in the world toward that gentleman, but of the very kindest character. The only point I make is that, judging of the matter from my stand-point, which differs essentially from the stand-point of the Senator from Pennsylvania and the Senator from Delaware who have just taken their seats, I do not think it would be a good thing to do. I should prefer to see the present incumbent retained in the custody of that portfolio, and therefore I am not willing to leave the power in the hands of the President to take it from him without the consent of the Senate. That is the only point I make upon it. I do not think that is a very strange opinion for me to entertain. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWARD. I shall vote for the motion made by the Senator from Wisconsin to strike out the exception contained in the third line of the first section.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President—
The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Michigan give way to the Senator from Pennsylvania?

Mr. HOWARD. I have but a word to say. I shall so vote, not for the reason intimated by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, though I may say with truth that I sympathize with him somewhat in the reason which he has given, but I shall do it in order to save the principle which is incorporated in the bill. The clause reads that every person, except the heads of Departments, holding any civil office, shall hold the same until his successor shall be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The principle of the bill is, if I understand it rightly, that all civil officers of the United States shall be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. To except from the category the heads of Departments, as is done by the clause as it now stands, seems to me to give up the principle and to acknowledge in the same breath that as to the highest officers of the Government the President has authority to remove them at pleasure during the vacation and to appoint others in their stead. That is the very principle that we are combatting.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Allow me to say to my friend from Michigan that he misapprehends the principle of the bill, taking his statement of it, in this: the bill does not undertake to declare that every civil officer shall be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate; but it simply undertakes to declare that every civil officer who by law is required to be appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, with the exception named, shall hold his office for a certain length of time. That is, it regulates the duration of holding office; and it makes this exception, not as surrendering the principle upon which the bill goes, but because by express authority of law now the President is authorized by the law, as I say, or as is claimed, in opposition by the Constitution, to remove these officers at pleasure. We thought it right for the time being at least to try the experiment of still authorizing him by law, that is leaving the law to stand just as it does now, to change Cabinet ministers. That is the principle of the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I did not misunderstand the theory of the bill; nor was it very highly necessary in my judgment that the Senator from Vermont should have interrupted me with a view to correct what he calls my misapprehension. What the bill intends to do is to prevent the President of the United States removing from office during the vacation those who have been regularly appointed, and substituting others in their stead. That is the evil which we propose to remedy. Now, sir, this exception in the bill seems to me to yield the very principle itself upon which the bill is founded, and to say to the President, "You may remove the Secretary of State, the Secretary of War, &c., during the recess of the Senate and appoint others in their stead if you see fit to do so." In short, it appears to me to be a clause which is utterly inconsistent with the object, the scope, and purpose of the bill; and I shall therefore, for the sake of harmonizing the provisions of the bill, vote to strike out this exception, and then I shall vote also to strike out another clause in the second section, which is a recognition of this previous exception.

Mr. COWAN. Mr. President, I understand that my colleague has explained my position in the matter which, as I think, has been without any sufficient warrant introduced here as an offense on the part of the President. I have only to say, as I understand my colleague has already said, that I am utterly, entirely, and totally innocent of all these honors which are about to be thrust upon me; I have never had the slightest intimation of any one of them; and this report, to which the Senator from Wisconsin has directed my attention, that I am to be Secretary of War, I certainly never heard from anybody connected with the President, the Secretary of War, or anybody else in authority. I have only to state further with regard to the Secretary of War that from the time he accepted that position he and myself have been upon the most friendly and intimate terms, coming from the same region of country and having known each other for a long time, and I do not know of anybody to whom he might more safely intrust his destinies for fair play than to myself.

I make this statement in order that these things, which are mere rumors, idle wind, which may be made by anybody, may not be allowed to influence the action of this body in the premises.

Mr. CONNESS. From the direction that the latter part of this debate has taken it might appear as though the Senate, or some part of the Senate, desired the adoption of the amendment now proposed by the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, for the purpose of preserving to the distinguished citizen who now holds the position of Secretary of War the office which he has so ably filled and which he still graces. I take it that it is scarcely necessary to be said here or necessary to be said anywhere to those who know him or know his character, that he would be the last man either to seek or wish protection to himself in that or any other place. It is unnecessary to add that he occupies the place because of the high position that he holds in the hearts of the people, and the great fitness which he has in the opinion of the people for the office. I feel called upon to say this much only because of the turn the latter part of this debate has taken.

Mr. HOWE. I am obliged to the Senator from California for the reminder he has given the Senate, and I ought in support of it to say that of course I offered this amendment upon my own responsibility entirely, without the slightest consultation with the Secretary of War or anybody, so far as I know, that has seen the Secretary of War; and he had no more idea that the amendment was to be offered than a person on the other side of the Atlantic.

Mr. CONNESS. Of course not. That is well understood.

Mr. HOWE. I have, I avow here, a very high opinion of the public services of the Secretary of War. I should regard it a public calamity to have him removed at the present juncture. I should think the Congress of the United States assumed a grave responsibility if, knowing that there was a probability of his being removed, they allowed it to be done when they could prevent it; and I say this, not having been, as the Senator from Pennsylvania says has been the case with him, on intimate terms with the Secretary of War. I have occupied no confidential relation whatever with him. I have judged of him as from a distance, judged of his public acts, and put upon them perhaps an exalted, certainly a very high estimate, as I have no doubt every Senator on this floor has done.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 13, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Chandler, Fogg, Grimes, Howard, Howe, Lane, Morrill, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, and Wilson—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Buckalew, Cattell, Conness, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Fessenden, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Morgan, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Riddle, Saulsbury, Sherman, Van Winkle, Willey, Williams, and Yates—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cragin, Creswell, Davis, Fowler, Guthrie, Kirkwood, McDougall, Nye, Pomeroy, Rosa, Stewart, and Trumbull—12.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the sixth section by adding these words:

Provided, That the President shall have power to make out and deliver, after the adjournment of the Senate, commissions for all officers whose appointments shall have been advised and consented to by the Senate.

I do not think myself that this amendment is absolutely necessary; but as opinions differ as to the precise point of time when an appointment is completed, the committee thought it best, to save all question, inasmuch as the penalties of this section are very heavy, to add a proviso giving the President power to make out, after we have adjourned, commissions in cases where we have confirmed men, on the last day of the session, for instance, so that he could not make out the commission before the adjournment.

Mr. HOWARD. I inquire of the Senator from Vermont whether that has not been the uniform practice of the President in such cases. I think it has been. I have no desire to make opposition to this amendment, but it seems to me to be supererogatory.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That undoubtedly has been the uniform practice; but it has also been the uniform practice of the President to remove and appoint and make out commissions at his own free will altogether. We now propose to regulate the duration of appointments and to punish by heavy penalties any violation of this act; and we do not think it wise, on the whole, to leave it open to any criticism as to what precise point of time an appointment takes effect, and therefore we thought it better to say in express words, to save all question, that commissions in these cases may be issued after the adjournment.

Mr. HOWARD. I do not wish to oppose this amendment, though I really think it is superfluous. I think the point was decided by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Marbury vs. Madison. What I understand to be the proceeding is this: the President of the United States makes a nomination of a particular officer to the Senate; that is to say, he asks the Senate to give their advice and consent to the appointment of A. B. Suppose the Senate does so, and the proper officer of the Senate reports the fact to the President; then he has in his hand the advice and consent of the Senate to that particular nomination. After this advice and consent are thus communicated to the President I do not understand that he is under the slightest obligation actually to appoint that nominee. The vote of the Senate may remain in his drawer unnoticed. The appointment, properly and strictly speaking, is never made and completed until the President, in the form of a regular commission, with the seal of the United States affixed by the Secretary of State, has appointed the person to that office. In other words, I think that an appointment by the President is never complete and the office completely vested in the appointee until a commission has thus been signed and delivered to the appointee. Is not that the law? Believing that to have been the understanding of the country and to have been the decision of the Supreme Court, or rather the reasoning of Mr. Chief Justice Marshall in the case to which I have referred, I cannot see the propriety or necessity of this amendment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is precisely the reason why the committee thought it best to offer this amendment. Inasmuch as we preclude any appointments being made in the recess, so far as the making out of the commission for a person whose appointment the Senate have advised and consented to is a part of the appointment, we want to have the President authorized to do it in the recess when necessary, and therefore to save any question as to violating the penal provisions of the section we thought it wise to put in this provision. My own opinion is that it is not necessary, but we did not want to leave any excuse to prevent the making out of the commission in such a case.

Mr. HOWARD. Very well; if the committee have considered this somewhat delicate question and think this provision necessary I shall not object.

Mr. LANE. I am going to make a motion which I hope will meet the general concurrence. We propose by this bill to restrict the power of removal in the President. We have already determined upon the motion of the Senator from Massachusetts not to restrict certain officers to be removed in the future whose salary is over $1,000. We have upon motion of the Senator from Wisconsin already voted that Cabinet officers shall be excluded. We propose to do a certain thing and at the same time the bill does not accomplish it; and I move now the indefinite postponement of the bill, and I shall vote for that motion in the hope that it may prevail.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion has precedence. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. SUMNER. I cannot say that at this stage I am ready to vote for the indefinite postponement of the bill, but I am ready to say that the votes which have been taken do deprive the bill of its essential practical value. The Senator from Vermont follows up his bill on points of law: he had better meet the practical questions of the hour; they are involved not in law, but in facts. The facts are that a tyranny at the other end of the avenue seeks to oppress the honest citizens of this Republic. We can interpose our protecting arm, but we have refused to do it. Now, we proceed to try to settle certain questions of law. If those questions of law can be settled by this bill, I shall be glad of it; therefore I am not ready at this moment to vote for the indefinite postponement of the bill; but I do say that the bill will be of very little practical value compared with what it could be had it not been shorn of its proper functions. The bill does not meet the exigency of the times. It ignores great facts that fill this whole country. It ignores the tyranny of the President, which is brought to bear with a strong arm upon loyal and patriotic citizens throughout the land. It seeks simply to vindicate to itself certain powers of the Senate, and thus to throw a safeguard over a certain number constituting a limited class of office-holders. The bill should go further and surround all office-holders, so far as it is practicable, with the arms of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, the difficulty with my friend from Massachusetts seems to be that unless he can have plum-pudding every day he is almost ready to starve. I suppose, on his theory, if we were organizing a court of justice, he never would consent to the passage of a bill which should establish a judiciary until he had gone over the country and gathered up all the suitors and arranged their places in it and provided exactly who should be tried first. If my friend from Massachusetts would only consider for a moment that the simple proposition in this bill relates to the powers of the Senate and to the duration of the tenure of certain offices and to nothing else, and would content himself with doing one thing at a time, there would then be time enough to declare afterward how broad the area should be of the number of offices to whose appointment the confirmation of the Senate should be a necessary ingredient. As fast as that number of offices is enlarged, just so fast the officers to fill them will come within the scope of the protection of this bill. Now, I implore my friend from Massachusetts and my friend from Indiana, if they are really sincere in treating this subject in any other way than that of mere enthusiasm and heat, let us settle the principles upon which the action of the President and Senate shall proceed, and then as fast as the occasion arises we shall find the subjects upon whom these principles shall operate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Indiana to postpone the bill indefinitely.

Mr. LANE. I do not wish to embarrass the action of my party friends; I have generally acted with them; and I will withdraw the motion, although I think there is nothing at all in the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That motion being withdrawn, the question recurs on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. JOHNSON. The Senator from Vermont has no doubt given more attention to the subject of his amendment than I have, but it seems to me to be liable to two objections, the first of which is that it is not necessary. The President as a matter of course, or of the proper Department, would have the power to issue the commission after the Senate had advised and consented to the appointment. I think that is regulated by a general law independent of this provision. The second objection is that perhaps impliedly it takes from the President authority to issue commissions during the session of the Senate. It says that he shall issue commissions to officers when the Senate has advised, consented to their appointment, after the adjournment of the Senate. Then, if there is no law now which gives him authority to issue commissions in the recess, the implication from this language would be that no commission could be issued during the session of Congress. That would be attended with very great difficulty, particularly during the long session, when we are here sometimes until the month of August, and have been here until September. During that whole period, from week to week and month to month, appointments are being made, and that will be the case if this bill passes in such cases as are provided for by the bill.

If I am right in supposing that the implication will be that there is no authority to issue a commission until after the adjournment of Congress, the officers appointed early in the session, not intermediately in the session, would have to wait until Congress adjourned before they could get their commissions. That I suppose is not the purpose of my friend from Vermont; but I submit to him whether that perhaps will not be the effect of his amendment.

On the other question I am not so certain; that is to say, whether the President has not the power, or to state it more correctly, whether it is not his duty to issue commissions to officers who have been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Except for the authority of the Supreme Court in the case of Marbury vs. Madison, the doctrine of which was perhaps recognized as a sound one in the subsequent case of the United States vs. Guthrie, I should presume the President had no authority to withhold a commission, after it has been signed and filed in the Department, of an officer who has been appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. If there be any doubt of the authority of the President to issue a commission after the adjournment of the Senate, it is a doubt that ought to be cured by this amendment; but I am by no means sure that such a doubt is well founded, and I think it more probable perhaps that the amendment would create difficulty instead of removing it, by giving room for the construction that it takes from the President the power to issue commissions until the Senate does adjourn.

Mr. BUCKALEW. This amendment is clearly proper and necessary if the bill itself shall pass. By the third section it is provided that "if no appointment by and with the advice and consent of the Senate shall be made to such office so vacant or temporarily filled, as aforesaid, during such next session of the Senate, such office shall remain in abeyance"—shall not be filled. Then, in the sixth section, to which it is proposed to add the amendment, are provisions making it a penal offense to fill up or issue any paper in connection with an appointment forbidden by the present bill. It will follow that where an appointment is not actually made and the commission issued before the adjournment of the Senate, it cannot be made or issued after the adjournment. We know that in the closing hours of the session we very often confirm hundreds and hundreds of officers when it is physically impossible that the President shall in consequence of our confirmations sign the commissions before the Senate adjourns. It therefore becomes strictly necessary that we should confer authority by an amendment upon him to make the appointment, or rather sign the commission and issue it after our adjournment. It is physically impossible that he can do it before. The Senator from Maryland [Mr. JOHNSON] asks, does he not have that power now? Of course he has, but this bill takes it away. It takes away the power to make an appointment, to sign a commission, to issue a commission, to do any act where the office is not actually filled during the session of the Senate; it cannot be done afterward. If the Senator will look back to the third section and consider it in connection with the penal clauses of the sixth he will see that this amendment is indispensable.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I suppose we all understand this bill now very well, and the votes upon the different propositions indicate the pleasure of the majority to stand by the report of the committee, and I think it is desirable, as this bill is to pass, not by my vote however, that it should be passed this evening. It is a matter of comfort that we should soon come to a vote, and I suggest that we do come to a vote and dispose of this bill. If I thought further discussion was useful on the subject I should like to participate in it; but I reckon we have considered all the amendments it is important to consider, and I hope we shall come to a vote this evening so as not to take up any further time with it.

Mr. WADE. Very well; let us have a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on concurring in the amendment made in Committee of the Whole as it has been amended in the Senate.

The amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I promised my friend from Indiana yesterday that at the proper time I would endeavor to convince him and other gentlemen of the strict propriety of this measure under preceding legislation and under the Constitution; but I am disposed, as I perceive such is the temper of the Senate, and it agrees with my own decidedly, to forego any observations upon that point and let the bill come to a vote at once.

Mr. HENDRICKS. In reply to the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, I will say to him I have investigated the subject somewhat that was between us about the legislation on this subject, and he and I would not be able to agree upon the question of fact. So we shall have to postpone that discussion to some other bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading and was read the third time.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. JOHNSON (when his name was called) said: I have paired off with the member from Iowa, who is not in his seat, [Mr. KIRKWOOD,] on the question. He would have voted for the bill and I should have voted against it.

Mr. NORTON (when his name was called) said: I have paired off with the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. FOWLER,] who would have voted for the bill and I would have voted against it.

The result was announced—yeas 29, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howard, Howe, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Sumner, Van Winkle, Wade, Willey, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Dixon, Doxittle, Hendricks, Nesmith, Patterson, Riddle, and Saulsbury—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Creswell, Davis, Fowler, Guthrie, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, McDougall, Norton, Nye, Pomeroy, Ross, Stewart, and Trumbull—14.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. EDMUNDS, the title of the bill was amended so as to read, "A bill regulating the tenure of certain civil offices."

PERSONAL EXPLANATION—THE TARIFF BILL.

Mr. GRIMES. I rise to a personal explanation.

A friend has just called my attention to the last number of a newspaper, published in the city of New York, called The Iron Age, which contains an article headed "Senator GRIMES and the Tariff" which reads thus:

"It was on the motion of Senator GRIMES, of Iowa, that the consideration of the tariff bill passed by the House was postponed until the present session. In making his memorable motion Mr. GRIMES is reported in the Congressional Globe as using the following words:

"I do not believe that you can convince the people of any State that it will be to their advantage to increase the duty on iron variously from ten to fifty dollars a ton; or that it will be for their advantage to increase the duty on the low grades of cutlery, such as go into every farmer's house, six hundred percent."

"We should be very sorry to do Senator GRIMES an injury; but it is fair to him to say that it is currently reported that he has a pecuniary interest in a hardware establishment in Burlington, Iowa, and is a silent partner in a cutlery business in Beekman street, New York; and as in his speech proposing the postponement of the tariff he exhibited special repugnance to the duty on cutlery, it is, to say the least, not a little significant that the Senate bill should come with lower duties than were proposed either by the House bill or that of Mr. Wells. It looks certainly a little suspicious that in these special instances the tariff should be sent from the Senate so strangely low. But possibly the honorable gentleman has no pecuniary interest in this matter of imported cutlery, and has not used his influence as a member of the Senate to promote his own private ends. In that case we shall be happy to publish the disclaimer: at present it is but just to tell him that appearances are against him."

Mr. FESSENDEN. What paper is that in?

Mr. GRIMES. The Iron Age, the organ of the manufacturers of iron and cutlery in the United States. This, it seems, is the manner in which these men are to operate upon the fears and the judgments of members of Congress to induce them to assist in passing a bill which, in my conviction, while it would be to their advantage would be vastly to the disadvantage of a vast portion of this country, if not the whole of it.

Now, sir, as to the facts, I desire to say that it is true that I was once a partner in a house that conducted the hardware business; but my entire interest in that establishment ceased on the 28th of August, 1865. From that day to this I have never had the slightest interest in anything connected with the hardware or the iron business. I am not the owner, either directly or indirectly, of a dollar's worth of hardware save what is in use in my own dwelling for domestic purposes.

As to the statement that I am a partner in an establishment in Beekman street in the city of New York, I have simply to say that it is unqualifiedly false. I cannot imagine from what this falsehood springs, except it be from the fact that a person who once had an interest in my business in the State of Iowa is now, in some way or other, connected with a cutlery establishment in Beekman street, in New York. I do not even know the name of the firm with which he is associated.

My constituents, I think, the people of my own town and of my own State, know whether I am interested in an improper manner in the hardware or in the iron business. I have never heard that they suspected me of being improperly interested in this regard.

All I have to say is, that if the gentlemen connected with the iron and steel association, or any of those who act under their inspiration, imagine that they are going to accomplish any good for themselves by such gross, slanderous, libelous attacks upon members of this body, I trust they will find that they are mistaken; they certainly will so far as it depends upon me.

That this publication was intended as a libel is evident, from the fact that the publishers of the Iron Age could, without the slightest difficulty, have informed themselves of the falsity of their charges without going out of the city of New York, where their publication is issued.

As to the influence that I am said to have exerted upon members of the Finance Committee to induce them to report on the subject of cutlery as they have reported in the tariff bill they can answer for themselves. If I have ever spoken to any member of the committee on that subject during the present or in any preceding session of Congress I am not conscious of it.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 598, to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy.

Mr. CHANDLER. I desired to make the same motion in regard to the Niagara ship-canal bill; but as the Senator is in advance of me, I will now move that the Senate adjourn, and I give notice that I shall try to get that bill up to-morrow at one o'clock.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the honorable member do me the favor to withdraw his motion that I may say a word upon a question which interests us all I think?

Mr. CHANDLER. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to adjourn is withdrawn.

PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS—THE TARIFF.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, in the latitude which the press or rather positions of the press sometimes take, it very often happens that every man in public life is more or less aspersed, or that injustice is done him in some form or other, either from party motives, or as frequently from interested motives. I felt that the instance to which the honorable member from Iowa [Mr. GRIMES] called the attention of the Senate was one of the latter character; and I was at the moment about to rise, and I believe my friend from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] was about to rise, for the purpose of saying a word upon that subject, when other matters intervened.

The honorable member from Iowa, wherever he is known, (and he is known well to all of us,) needed not for his vindication anything to be said by himself in contradiction of the charge, or the assumed charge, to which the editor of this paper alluded to by him has subjected him. I cannot say all that I think in his presence; but I may, without violating any good taste, I hope, say that every Senator upon this floor must be convinced that there is no member of the body who is more incapable of acting from improper or interested motives than the honorable member from Iowa. His appearance in this Chamber is not of a day only; he has been with us for years, he was reelected by an almost unanimous vote of his Legislature, and has resolved, wisely I suppose for himself, long before his term expired, to do nothing more than serve out that term, and then retire to private life, where I am sure he will be respected as much as he has been respected, and by those who know him beloved, by the members of this body.

The public, however, may not know the character of the honorable member, and I think it is due—a debt which we owe each to the other at all times and under all circumstances—when we find a brother member assailed to denounce it, if we believe it to be false, as a groundless slander. Such, I am sure, is the case in the instance to which the honorable member has called the attention of the Senate.

But, not satisfied with impeaching almost the honesty of the member from Iowa, charging him with having been in his public course influenced by considerations of personal interest, the writer of this article has ventured to say that he has been able through that instrumentality, or some other, to influence the members of the Finance Committee. Those who know the members of that committee, from its chairman down and including all its members, know that that must be false. They may be mistaken in relation to the tariff which they may propose from time to time, or in relation to the internal taxes which they may propose to have levied from time to time; but no man who knows the chairman of that committee, and the honorable men with whom he has been associated during the period he has been the chairman of that committee, will hesitate for a moment to charge as a vile calumny if it be asserted that they have been influenced, any one of them, by improper motives in any measure to which they have given the recommendation of that committee.

I have said this, Mr. President, not because we ourselves demand or require any vindication to satisfy us that they stand above just reproach, but to say to those who deal in calumny or in slander that their efforts, as far as relates to the standing of the members of this body, will be aimless, if they are founded in falsehood.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I did not hear all of the article read by the honorable Senator from Iowa, but I am informed since that it makes an allusion to the Committee on Finance, and to the influence that was probably exerted by the honorable Senator from Iowa upon that committee. I can answer for only one of them, and I will say very frankly with regard to the general subject that if there is a man in or out of this Senate who possesses influence with me it is the honorable Senator from Iowa. No man possesses more. I have great respect for his opinions and for the uniform integrity of his character, as we all have. But, sir, I must say in justification of the Senator and of the committee, or the chairman of it in this particular instance, that the honorable Senator never spoke to me that I know of upon the subject referred to, or alluded to it in any way whatever. All I ever heard him say on the subject was said here on the floor of the Senate; and I presume it is the case with regard to all the rest of the committees. But, sir, if the Senator from Iowa or any other Senator had in conversation expressed his views outside of the committee-room upon the general subject of legislation on the tariff bill, or any particular item of it, it is a right that was perfect in him; and I trust if he had said it, or anybody else, I should have listened to those opinions with all respect and attention, and given to them all the weight which I thought they deserved. I hold it the perfect right, not only the right, but the duty of Senators to communicate with each other and to aid each other as far as possible in coming to correct conclusions on all subjects, both in the Senate Chamber and out of it.

Having said thus much, I have a word or two to add. I have for some time been of the opinion that if a man has made up his mind to do his duty honestly by his country as a legislator in the Senate or the House of Representatives, he has got to do it at the risk of his character as an honest man, and he runs more risk than those, if there are any such, who do not legislate upon those principles. I have observed that if a Senator happens to run across some scheme that is got up and pressed upon the Senate or the House of Representatives, or the Congress collectively, which is to eventuate in large profit to individuals, and places himself in opposition to it, forthwith he finds that some correspondents are attacking him for something or other, and, following upon the correspondents, forthwith some newspapers in certain sections are attacking him on the subject, trying to throw an imputation upon his integrity of action or his ability to understand the questions before the Senate. The more a man stands in the way of schemes for personal profit and personal advantage the more risk he runs of having his motives and his character assailed. Therefore I came to the conclusion myself that the only way for a man was to go along and do his duty as well as he could and take his chances; and I make up for it in my own individual case by not reading the newspapers any more than I can possibly help. [Laughter.] I very seldom look at them; and with regard to an attack upon myself, the only way that I generally hear of it is when some good-natured friend, like the Senator from Massachusetts—I mean the Senator nearest me—for instance, points my attention to it. I do not say that he ever did so; but some good-natured friend will say: "Have you seen the attack upon you in such a paper?" Or perhaps the author himself who wrote it, or the editor of the paper, cuts it out and addresses it to me for my own particular edification.

Mr. SUMNER. That is the common way. Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, that is the common way, to let me know what the newspapers say. Sir, I have as much regard for public opinion as anybody, that is, for a just public opinion, and like to receive the approbation of my fellow-citizens; but I have not got to that pass yet when every squib in a newspaper that any interested party chooses to launch at me, or even an attack of a stronger character, if there are any such, disturbs my equanimity to any very great extent. I am perfectly willing to "let them slide," and if they can have the best of it of course I must take the consequences.

Now, sir, let me state a fact as an illustration to show precisely how men are judged. A gentleman who is special commissioner of the revenue has been engaged, under the directions of Congress and of the Secretary of the Treasury, in the discharge of the duties of his office; he has been hard at work for months upon the tariff, devoting all his time to it with very great assiduity very much to the injury of his own health. He is not a man without means in the world. He is a gentleman of very comfortable fortune, who has taken hold of this business because he loves it, because it is the kind of thing which suits his taste. All these questions are to him questions of interest. He is able upon such subjects, and he is desirous to make a reputation in connection with them. He devoted himself with great assiduity to the duty before him. Well, sir, he got his report ready and brought it to Washington. Before anybody saw it hardly certain intimations were sent out from here—I saw them myself—in letters of correspondents and telegraphic dispatches that the commissioner's bill was here and it was a free-trade tariff; we were going to have a free-trade tariff, and the Senator from Maine and the Secretary of the Treasury and the commissioner were alluded to as getting up a free-trade tariff. I had not known anything about it at that time; had not seen it, and had not expressed an opinion, and have not, I believe, on the subject, except as the report of the committee expresses my opinion. He was denounced as a free-trader, and a man who had sold himself for British gold. Pretty soon his tariff scheme came out, or it was ascertained what it was—that instead of being a free-trade measure it was a very considerable advance upon the tariff of 1864, which was anything but a free-trade tariff; that although not quite up to the House tariff bill, it was an advance upon the last one; and the duties in it are so very high in some particulars that now the other side, the free-traders, turn round and say he is bought by the protectionists. Well, if he has been bought on both sides perhaps he has a profitable business of it. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, let me say that men in public life must stand these things; but I want to say of the special commissioner of the revenue, because I feel bound to say it, that I believe there has been no man more devoted to the public service in the line which he has adopted, or one who has given his time more honestly and more thoroughly to the investigation of the subjects committed to his charge. He has come to conclusions which are satisfactory to himself, not perhaps in all particulars to the Committee on Finance, for we have varied from them in many particulars, but such as he honestly believed to be true and for the best interests of the community; and this is his reward! Why? Because, in the first place, he was supposed to run against the personal interests of the protectionists, but now he runs against the interests of the importers.

Well, sir, I came to the conclusion long ago that the only thing we can do decently in relation to all these matters is to just go along and legislate according to our own belief of what is true and just and right and for the best interests of the country. We shall make mistakes undoubtedly; I expect to make a great many, as I have heretofore; but at any rate whatever comes we shall retain our own self-respect, and all these little, miserable attacks from interested parties for their own personal objects will be but the merest brutum fulmen in the world, and will disappear like mist in the face of the honest discharge of duty, and the people will do justice to faithful public servants.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. LLOYD, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (S. No. 311) for the relief of James Pool.

The message further announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 431) providing for the punishment of certain crimes therein mentioned in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 229) to procure a site for a building to accommodate the post office and United States courts in New York city; and the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 964) in regard to the compensation of route agents in the Post Office Department.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. POLAND. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 593, to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. LANE. There is a motion to take up the bankrupt bill, and the Niagara ship-canal bill is antagonized with it. I am equally opposed to both, and therefore I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. POLAND. I beg the gentleman to withdraw his motion, so that we may have a vote on the motion I have submitted. If the motion to adjourn is not withdrawn I hope the Senate will vote it down.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. With the permission of the Senator from Indiana and of the Senate, before putting the motion to adjourn, the Chair will announce the signing of the following enrolled joint resolution and bill:

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 229) to procure a site for a building to accommodate the post office and United States courts in New York city; and

A bill (H. R. No. 964) in regard to the compensation of route agents in the Post Office Department.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will also, with the permission of the Senate, lay before the Senate certain House bills for reference.

The bill (H. R. No. 431) providing for the punishment of certain crimes therein named in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, and the bill (H. R. No. 571) to regulate proceedings before justices of the peace in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, were read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill (H. R. No. 896) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending 30th June, 1867, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is moved that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. LANE. I do not know how it is that bills are presented after my motion to adjourn. I made a motion to adjourn, and it seems to me that is the first motion to be put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator is certainly correct. The Chair, however, stated that with the permission of the Senator from Indiana and of the Senate, before putting the motion to adjourn, the Chair would announce the signing of certain enrolled bills, and also lay certain House bills before the Senate. No objection was made. The Chair therefore went on. It was the privilege of the Senator, certainly, to insist on his motion if he chose.

Mr. LANE. I will now withdraw the motion if gentlemen want to take up anything else.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to have a short executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to adjourn is withdrawn.

BANKRUPT BILL.

Mr. POLAND. My motion to take up the bankrupt bill is now in order, I believe.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is the motion now before the Senate. The question is on proceeding to the consideration of the bill indicated by the Senator from Vermont.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. SHERMAN, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and, after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, January 18, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rev. O. H. TIFFANY, D. D., of Chicago, Illinois.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

POST ROUTES IN MICHIGAN.

Mr. UPSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing post routes as follows: From Chinoe Prairie, in Kalamazoo county, Michigan, to Leonidas, in St. Joseph county; also from Galesburg, in said Kalamazoo county, via Pavilion Mills and Brown's Mill, to Mendon, in St. Joseph county; and to report by bill or otherwise.

AGRICULTURAL BUREAU.

Mr. RITTER. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following preamble and resolution for consideration at this time:

Whereas it is in the judgment of this House improper and a departure from the intention and design of Congress, in the establishment of the Bureau of Agriculture, for the Commissioner to purchase for distribution seeds that are common in the country: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Agriculture be, and they are hereby, instructed to report a bill restricting and prohibiting the said Commissioner from the purchase for distribution of any seeds, plants, or flowers that are common in the United States; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. SPALDING. I must object to this resolution unless it be modified so as to instruct the committee to inquire into the expediency of so reporting a bill.

Mr. RITTER. I will modify my resolution as suggested.

The preamble and resolution as modified were then agreed to.

JURISDICTION OF COURT OF CLAIMS.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. I have been requested to ask leave to introduce the following joint resolution, for reference to the Committee on the Judiciary:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the jurisdiction of the act entitled "An act to restrict the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims, and to provide for the payment of certain demands for quartermaster stores and subsistence supplies furnished to the Army of the United States, approved July 4, 1864," be, and the same is hereby, extended to the counties of Frederick, Warren, Clarke, Shenandoah, Page, and Rockingham, in the State of Virginia.

The SPEAKER. That requires unanimous consent at this time.

Mr. CULLOM. I object.

CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENT—KENTUCKY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Governor of Kentucky, announcing the rejection by that State of the constitutional amendment; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

A. D. MOREY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Attorney General, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House of January 14, 1867, the papers relative to the case of A. D. Morey, indicted in the local court at Vicksburg, Mississippi; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

INTERNAL REVENUE DRAWBACK REGULATIONS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting, in compliance with the resolution of the House of January 15, 1867, copies of all drawback regulations which have been prescribed under the internal revenue law; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

CONTINGENT FUND OF TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting statements of the disbursement of the contingent fund of the various offices of his Department, as required by the twentieth section of the act of August 26, 1842; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BENJAMIN called for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. This being private bill day, the first business in order is the consideration of reports of a private character from committees. On Saturday last, being private bill day, the House granted to the Committee for the District of Columbia an additional hour for their business, and that committee is now in order to make reports.

TRANSPORTATION AND COAL COMPANY.

The SPEAKER. The first business in order is the consideration of the bill pending at the expiration of the morning hour on yesterday, being a private bill reported by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELKER] from the Committee for the District of Columbia, with an amendment, being bill of the House No. 592, to incorporate the Washington Transportation and Coal Company.

The bill was read at length.

The amendment reported from the committee was to add to section three the words "and the laws of the States respectively."

Mr. PRICE. I would inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELKER] how this amendment will affect the bill.

Mr. WELKER. It provides that in the transaction of business outside of the District this corporation shall be governed and controlled by the laws of the State in which the business shall be transacted.

Mr. PRICE. That is all right enough. I thought it had reference to two other points to which I had intended to call the attention of the committee reporting this bill.

Mr. HISE. I desire to offer an amendment to this bill to the effect that the corporators and stockholders of this company shall be severally and generally responsible for all the debts and trespasses of this company.

Mr. WELKER. I cannot yield for any such amendment. The bill already provides that the stockholders shall be liable to the amount of stock they have subscribed.

Mr. HISE. I must vote against the bill unless qualified as I have proposed, and I would like an opportunity to state to the House my reasons for that vote.

Mr. WELKER. I must decline to yield for that purpose.

Mr. PRICE. I desire to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELKER] whether it would not be better, in that clause of the bill which provides that the stockholders shall have the power to make such by-laws as they may deem proper, to add the words "not inconsistent with the charter;" and further whether in that part of the bill which binds the stockholders for the amount of their stock, it would not be better to insert the usual requirement in acts of incorporation and make the stockholders liable for twice the amount of their stock. I suggest to the gentleman that he had better allow something of this kind to go into the bill if he wishes it to be passed.

Mr. WELKER. I am willing to yield for the first amendment which the gentleman suggests; but I cannot consent to the second amendment which he proposes.

Mr. PRICE. Then I hope that the House will not sustain the call for the previous question and will vote down the bill; for no act of incorporation ought to pass here or elsewhere unless the stockholders of the bank, railroad company, or other corporation are bound for twice the amount of their stock. No other rule is safe.

Mr. WELKER. I will allow the gentleman to offer the amendment. If the House desires its adoption I will interpose no objection.

Mr. PRICE. Then I offer the following amendment:

After the word "prescribe," in the second section, insert the words "not inconsistent with this charter." In the same section strike out the word "full," and insert in lieu thereof the word "double," so as to read "double the amount of their stock."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELKER] to yield to me a moment for a single suggestion.

Mr. WELKER. I will do so.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the committee and the House to one very singular fact in connection with this bill and numerous other bills that have been reported from the committee creating corporations in the District of Columbia. The names of the corporators in this bill seem to be very familiar to me. Almost every bill which has been reported for the incorporation of a company in this district has contained one or more or all of these names. There seems to be an effort made to consolidate in the hands of a few persons in this District corporate powers for every business purpose of the District. Now, sir, I for one object to consolidating in the hands of a few individuals powers to build up monopolies which shall embrace all branches of business. The operations contemplated in this bill are to extend to the article of fuel.

There is another thing that strikes me as very singular in connection with this bill. If I have understood it correctly as read by the Clerk, it proposes to continue in the hands of the first board of directors perpetual succession. In other words, the board of directors may by their own vote fill all vacancies occurring in the board. Sir, I hope that the House will hesitate before passing any more bills of this kind. This bill does not contemplate any operations in this District beyond the sale of coal. The coal fields lie beyond the District. It is proposed that we shall charter a company for the purpose of operating roads and canals and bringing coal in here, so as to monopolize the coal trade of this District.

Now, sir, unless the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. WELKER], who has reported this bill, can give some very good reason for the establishment of a monopoly of this kind, and some very good reason for the incorporation of the favored individuals named in all these bills that have been reported, and some good reason for placing in the hands of this board of directors a power of perpetual succession, I hope the House will either defeat the bill by a direct vote or lay it on the table.

Mr. WELKER. In reply to the gentleman from Iowa, I will say that I do not know any reason why the names of the same individuals are inserted in these bills of incorporation. It may be that these gentlemen are the capitalists of the District of Columbia and the only individuals who make application for acts of incorporation to carry on business of this kind.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think I might suggest an explanation to the gentleman from Ohio. It may be that these individuals who are constantly applying for charters intend to make money out of them by selling the franchises to some persons who may be desirous to engage in these particular branches of business.

Mr. WELKER. In reply I will say I do not see anything in the act of incorporation which authorizes them to sell their charter.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. They appear very often before this House in these bills.

Mr. WELKER. In reference to another objection the gentleman makes to this bill, that these directors may make their directorship perpetual, I will say I am willing an amendment shall be moved to make the election of directors annual. I remember no provision of the kind is contained in the bill. This company is intended to act outside of this District. It is intended to operate in Cumberland, and from the mines in that region coal is to be transported down the canal to Washington; and it is authorized to do general trading business. I do not see how this corporation can become a monopoly any more than a common partnership or any other combination of men who may engage in the coal business.

I know a great many attempts have been made to incorporate these companies, and for myself I should prefer that Congress should pass a general act of incorporation rather than to do as we have been doing.

In looking into this charter I see nothing objectionable, nor do the committee who make this report, in the provisions contained in this bill. Some of the men who are named as incorporators may be men to whom members may take personal exception. I do not know that. It was a matter not considered by the committee. We considered the incorporation for this purpose, and we did not think there was anything in this bill which could lead to the consequences spoken by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I wish to ask the gentleman a question. We have lately passed a bill enfranchising a certain class of our fellow-citizens. Now, before they can assume their rights in this District it seems to me we are chartering away all of those rights. It seems to me these charters should be given without distinction of race or color. [Laughter.] We ought to live up to the faith we profess. I therefore suggest to the gentleman to insert the name of John D. Johnson, a well-known and respectable man, known to every member of this House, who I am certain owns as much property as many of those who are named here.

Mr. WELKER. I will let the gentleman move the amendment.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I move then to substitute the name of John D. Johnson for that of Charles Knap. He will be a representative of our colored brethren who were lately enfranchised.

The SPEAKER. No amendment is now in order.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not object if it is understood we shall have the yeas and nays on the amendment.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Certainly. I want the country to see we are living up to our professions.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. I ask whether there are any coal mines in the District of Columbia?

Mr. INGERSOLL. No.

Mr. STEVENS. Is this an act of incorporation to work coal mines?

Mr. WELKER. Yes, sir; and for the transportation of coal, &c.

Mr. STEVENS. I desire to say I look upon it then as the most pernicious proposition before this House this year. The idea of incorporating companies to interfere with private enterprise where private capital is fully competent seems to me to be a great mistake. It was tried in Pennsylvania thirty years ago when our coal mines were first worked, and it was found to be injurious to all private interests. There was a general uprising against it by the mining districts, and it has long since been rejected as utterly untenable. I object to the whole matter without regard to the particular features of this bill.

Mr. WELKER. Is it not true a large number of companies are now engaged in mining coal in Pennsylvania?

Mr. DAVIS. There is a large number of companies in Pennsylvania doing business, transporting coal, &c., and I ask whether it is under any general law?

Mr. STEVENS. There is a law by which companies may build railroads and carry upon them anything they choose, whether coal or anything else. There were originally companies formed to work mines, simply as miners, but Pennsylvania has repealed those charters and refuses to renew them.

Mr. DAVIS. I suspect the gentleman from Pennsylvania, while he has been giving very strict attention to his public duties as a member of Congress for a few years past, has overlooked the legislation of his own State. I undertake to say that in 1863 the Legislature of Pennsylvania passed a general statute authorizing the formation of coal corporations, with the right of transportation; that in 1864 that statute was amended, and that both those acts are now on the statute-book of Pennsylvania. Now, I know nothing about this bill or the character of the parties to be incorporated under it.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the gentleman refer to any special law or to one open to all?

Mr. DAVIS. To a general law.

Mr. STEVENS. Oh, certainly; undoubtedly.

Mr. DAVIS. But the objection the gentleman made was that these corporations were interfering with the rights of individuals.

Mr. STEVENS. I referred to the former practice of creating special corporations. A general law has since been passed allowing everybody to embark in the business.

Mr. DAVIS. Was the charter of the Pennsylvania Coal Company, or the Delaware and Hudson Canal Company, or the Delaware, Lackawanna and Western Railroad Company repealed or abolished?

Mr. STEVENS. The charters for those coal companies were long ago granted in Pennsylvania, and they did not undertake to abolish them, although there was a very strong protest against them, and no such charters have since been granted.

Mr. DAVIS. The gentleman said all these corporations were abolished.

Mr. STEVENS. So far as they had an opportunity to do it; these old charters were irrepealable laws.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I find in looking at this bill "that said company is authorized and empowered to rent, purchase, and hold such real estate as may be necessary to carry into effect the objects of their organization, and to build thereon all necessary docks, wharves, ships, roads, and buildings for their own use and accommodation; to rent, purchase, and hold coal mines for the purpose of mining the same; to build, purchase, own, and rent boats propelled by steam or otherwise, to carry freight and passengers," &c. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELKER] how this affects the coal trade beyond the limits of the United States; whether there is any limit to the power of this company in regard to mining, building, and general transportation by ships and steamboats within as well as outside the limits of the States?

Mr. WELKER. In reply to the gentleman I will say that so far as the bill is concerned there is no limitation; but I apprehend a corporate company in the District of Columbia would not possess any advantages upon the broad seas over any other individuals engaged in that branch of trade.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Then it is free to extend itself over the whole United States.

Mr. WELKER. I do not know whether this company intend to extend their business; I am not advised as to that.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. They have the power to do it under this bill.

Mr. WELKER. I suppose they can buy vessels, go across the ocean, and do that class of business; but they can do that I suppose without an act of incorporation if they have money enough to buy vessels.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. This is an act to authorize almost any kind of business and confines it to no locality except that the company itself is here in Washington.

Mr. WELKER. This corporation is like all others that have been created by Congress to transact business in the District of Columbia. There has been no special limitation as to the place where they may do business, and this is as general as other bills that have heretofore been reported by this committee and adopted by Congress. We do not of course undertake to limit the right of the company to trade wherever they can otherwise than by requiring them to obey the laws of the States in which they may transact business.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I came in but a moment ago. I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. WELKER] to say that it was intended this corporation should operate in the district I have the honor to represent. I feel warranted therefore in making this inquiry. I would be glad to know whether these incorporators are to be responsible in their individual capacity for the contracts of the corporation.

Mr. WELKER. In answer to that I will state that the bill itself provides that the stockholders shall be individually liable to the amount of their stock, and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] has moved an amendment, which is now pending, to make them liable for double the amount of their stock.

Mr. F. THOMAS. I would simply make the remark in this connection that no section of the country has suffered more seriously than the county of Alleghany, in Maryland, from corporations created by the State of Maryland for the benefit of non-residents of that State. These charters unfortunately did not make the parties obtaining them responsible for the contracts of the corporations, and the amount out of which the population of Alleghany county has been plundered by such corporations has been enormous. One charter after another was granted to gentlemen from the northern section of the Union. They have come into Alleghany county and engaged in large operations and become indebted to the landed proprietors and also to the laboring classes of that county. Those companies have become utterly insolvent, and when their affairs came to be wound up a few old spades and pick-axes and worn-out horses were all that could be found to pay thousands of dollars of indebtedness. Now, I hope Congress will not thus interpose between the people of Maryland and these speculators and afford a further opportunity for plunder.

Maryland has upon her statute-book a law adequate to accomplish any purpose like this. Any number of individuals may go into Alleghany county and purchase coal mines and place on the county records evidence of title, and they are then entitled under the law to become a corporation for all purposes of mining, and they are amenable to the laws of Maryland. The extent of their resources is perfectly comprehended, and everybody who deals with them knows how far they can be trusted or not trusted. But under a charter like this speculators may go into the State of Maryland and reenact scenes the memory of which makes the heart of every man who loves his fellow-man sicken with sorrow and regret at the plunder and robbery committed. I hope, sir, if this bill is to pass, that these incorporators will be made responsible in their individual capacity for every dollar they may become indebted for in their operations.

Mr. WELKER. I desire to say to the gentleman from Maryland that there is a provision in the bill which requires the company to transact their business according to the laws of the State in which they may transact it.

Mr. F. THOMAS. Oh, yes.

Mr. WELKER. I demand the previous question on the bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was laid upon the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SINKING FUND.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Banking and Currency, reported back a bill to authorize the issue of Treasury notes, not bearing interest, to be used in providing a sinking fund for the extinguishment of the national debt, with a substitute; and moved that the bill be recommitted, and, with the substitute, ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BLAINE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. MERCUR, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported back, with sundry amendments, bill of the Senate No. 98, to incorporate the Metropolitan Fire and Marine Insurance Company of the District of Columbia.

The bill was read.

The amendments reported by the committee were then agreed to.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I ask the gentleman to allow me to have inserted in the list of incorporators the name of John D. Johnson.

Mr. MERCUR. I will accept that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman cannot accept an amendment to a bill reported from a committee. The amendment can be made by unanimous consent or by a vote of the House.

No objection being made, the amendment of Mr. WENTWORTH was agreed to.

Mr. MERCUR. I will, with the leave of the House, state the general features of this bill. This bill provides that this company shall have a capital of not less than $100,000 nor more than $1,000,000; that at the time of subscribing to the stock the sum of twenty dollars shall be paid in on each share of the stock subscribed, and that the balance shall be secured by mortgage, or notes indorsed, or bonds, which shall be approved by the directors of the company. The bill further provides that twenty dollars more on each share of stock subscribed shall be paid in at such times as the directors shall designate, not exceeding six months after the company shall have commenced business. It also provides that no dividends shall be made by the company greater than six per cent., unless there shall be remaining on hand a surplus of at least $20,000. There is another clause by which it is provided that annual statements showing all the affairs of the company shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of the Interior; and that those statements shall also be published for six weeks, as often as once a week, in two of the daily newspapers of the city of Washington.

Upon the question of security, this bill provides that the stockholders shall, in addition to their stock, be liable to an additional amount, not greater than the amount of capital stock subscribed by them, for the debts and liabilities of the company.

It is believed that all the safeguards are thrown around this corporation which the interests of the public may require. Some of them have been inserted in view of the disposition indicated by the House upon a former bill of like character which was before it for consideration.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I noticed, as the Clerk was reading the bill, that there was a provision in it declaring that no stockholder shall become liable to the corporation or association as the drawer or indorser to an amount greater than twenty per cent. of the amount of the stock held by him.

Mr. MERCUR. I think the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] has misunderstood the bill in that respect.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have a very distinct recollection of hearing those words read.

Mr. MERCUR. The bill provides that no stockholder shall be required to pay an assessment of more than twenty per cent. of his subscription at any one time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am satisfied I heard what I have stated, in connection with the words "drawer or indorser," and I could not see the propriety of such a provision in this bill, unless it rested upon another portion of the bill, to wit: that part which declares that the directors of this corporation shall have the power to determine what use shall be made of the profits of the association. Now it occurred to me that by taking these two sections of the bill together it might be discovered to be the intention of these corporators to engage in the business of banking.

Mr. MERCUR. They are expressly prohibited from doing that.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I know there is a limitation in the bill prohibiting them from issuing notes to circulate as money. But there is nothing there which prohibits them from engaging in the exchange and brokerage business, for instance. And therefore it occurred to me that in that view of the case it was very proper to provide that no stockholder shall become liable as a drawer or indorser to more than twenty per cent. of his stock. And if I am correct in my view of the bill, it seems to me the House, in ostensibly incorporating an insurance company, will not be pleased to incorporate also a banking institution.

There is one other suggestion which I wish to make to the gentleman. A corporation—an insurance company for instance—incorporated in one State can transact business—

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and the bill goes over till to-morrow.

The Chair will state, in reply to some inquiry which has been made why the Committee for the District of Columbia has four morning hours, that on Wednesday and Thursday of this week the committee was called in regular order for public business. On last Saturday the House, by unanimous consent, when the call for private business had reached the Committee for the District of Columbia, granted two morning hours to that committee. Thus the committee has four morning hours; and this bill goes over as unfinished business for to-morrow.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. DELANO. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. I make this motion in obedience to the wish of the Committee of Claims.

The motion was agreed to—ayes 58, noes 40.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole (Mr. PRICE in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of bills and joint resolutions on the Private Calendar, as follows:

JAMES POOL.

An act (S. No. 311) for the relief of James Pool.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Interior to pay to James Pool $1,287 10. Four hundred and eighty-seven dollars and fifty cents of this amount are to be paid out of any annuities or moneys payable to the Senecas and Shawnee Indians, if there be any, and if none, then the whole sum is to be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is there no report in this case?

Mr. JOHNSON. There is no report made to this House in this case. But the bill has passed three times in the Senate, and I have here the Senate report, which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read the report.

The bill was laid aside to be reported to the House.

REIMBURSEMENT TO WASHINGTON CITY.

An act (H. R. No. 710) to pay and discharge certain debts and expenditures to the corporation of the city of Washington.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to the proper authorities of the city of Washington, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $31,971 34, in full for all claims which the city of Washington now has against the United States on account of moneys expended in improving the streets, avenues, alleys, and public grounds in the city of Washington, or for repairing any of the bridges crossing the Potomac river prior to May 5, 1864. Before paying this sum, the mayor of the city of Washington is to present to the Commissioner of Public Buildings an account embracing each item of charge which the city has against the United States for expenditures herein referred to, which account the Commissioner is to certify to be correct and just.

The report was read. The committee state that when the city of Washington was laid out the proprietors gave to the United States ten thousand one hundred and thirty-six building lots, with the understanding that "whatever was realized from the sale of these lots was to be spent for the joint benefit of the then joint owners, the General Government and the proprietors of the soil." Of these lots, six thousand four hundred and eleven were sold prior to the year 1802, and yielded $642,682 62. Of this sum, $330,508 66 was applied toward building the Capitol, and $240,632 87 toward the erection of a Mansion for the Chief Magistrate of the United States.

Further receipts from the sale of these lots were expended as follows: $25,000 were given to each the Columbia and Georgetown colleges; $10,000 each to the St. Vincent and Washington Orphan Asylums in the District of Columbia, and from time to time various sums were expended in improving the property of the General Government and in paying the salaries and expenses of the Commissioner and Superintendent of Public Buildings and other officers and employes.

After the General Government had realized a large sum from these lots, said to amount to nearly one million dollars, Congress, recognizing the propriety of appropriating some portion of the proceeds of these lots for improvement of the city, did, by the fifteenth section of an act passed May 15, 1820, provide—

"That the Commissioner of Public Buildings, or other person appointed to superintend the United States disbursements in the city of Washington, shall reimburse to the corporation a just proportion of any expense which may hereafter be incurred in laying open, paving, or otherwise improving any of the streets and avenues in front of or adjoining to or which may pass through or between any of the public squares or reservations, which proportion shall be determined by the comparison of the length of the fronts of said squares or reservations (property) of the United States, on any such street or avenue, with the whole extent of the two sides thereof, (individual property) where the like improvements shall be ordered by the corporation in front of such lots adjoining or squares adjacent thereto; and he shall defray the expenses directed by this act out of any moneys arising from the sale of city lots, and from no other fund."—Statutes-at-Large, vol. iii, p. 591.

Under this act the Commissioner of Public Buildings, according to the testimony of the gentleman now filling that office, (Hon. B. B. French,) did pay the proportion of the General Government for all improvements in front of the property of the United States until all the city lots were sold and their proceeds exhausted. This fund was exhausted in 1854.

Since and including the year 1854 the corporation of Washington has advanced and paid (as is claimed) for the United States, on account of the improvement embraced in the act of Congress before referred to, the sum of $37,410 61, which remains unpaid because the fund arising from the sale of city lots, originally relied upon for payment, has been exhausted.

In considering the propriety of paying this claim two questions presented themselves to the minds of the committee:

1. The accuracy and fairness of the account on which the claim is founded.

2. The duty of the United States to pay it in case its accuracy and fairness shall be established.

The first question rests principally on the testimony of Hon. B. B. French, Commissioner of Public Buildings, who states in a letter to Hon. E. C. INGERSOLL, chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, that—"I have gone with great care over the items of charge made by the mayor of Washington against the United States, &c. I have done this with diagrams of the city of Washington and the mayor's vouchers before me. I find that every improvement specified as fronting on a public square or reservation is so situated; the distances are correct where stated, and where not stated I have measured them, and give them to the committee, with the prices charged, which in my opinion are very reasonable, indeed in many instances exceedingly low."

This letter is accompanied by a detailed report, giving each item of the account with the Commissioner's examination thereof and the voucher for the same furnished by the mayor, all of which have been before the committee and are on file with the memorial.

The committee examined the mayor and Commissioner of Public Buildings orally. In this examination the documentary evidence was confirmed, excepting as to the item for the sum of $2,500, dated September 14, 1860, for inclosing Judiciary square, under act of Congress approved March 3, 1857.

The committee ascertained that the iron fence inclosing Judiciary square on three sides was furnished by the United States. It was an old fence removed from the Capitol grounds, and its value, in the opinion of the committee, is equal to the equitable proportion chargeable to the United States for inclosing Judiciary square.

The committee state that they were not familiar with the history of congressional legislation in regard to the District of Columbia; but so far as they were able to inform themselves the account on which the memorialist rests her claim, except as before specified, is accurate.

3. Is it the duty of the United States to pay the claim?

By an act of Congress approved May 5, A. D. 1864, provision is made for paying the just proportion of the United States for all improvements to the streets, avenues, &c., in the city of Washington. This act seems to recognize the equitable liability of the United States to pay such proportion of these improvements for the health, convenience, and comfort of the inhabitants of the city as the property of the United States shall bear to the property of individual owners. Under this law no similar difficulty will hereafter be likely to arise.

The act of May 15, 1820, recognized the same principle; but having provided a specific fund to meet the liability of the United States, and this fund having been exhausted, it becomes necessary for the city to have assistance by legislation before she can be repaid what she has expended for the benefit of the property of the United States.

The committee also remark that Hon. James Harlan, Secretary of the Department of the Interior, in his last annual report, admits the validity of this claim and recommends its payment.

The committee further remark that it must be remembered that the account on which this claim rests was made under the act of 1820, after the fund arising from the sale of city lots had been exhausted, and prior to May 15, 1864, when the present law was approved, which provides for all similar claims arising after its passage. The act of 1864 is entitled "An act to amend the act of May 15, 1820."

Under these circumstances, and in view of the general liberality of the United States in aiding improvements in the city of Washington, the committee concluded to recommend the payment of the claim of the memorialist, without interest, after deducting the item of $5,439 27 for improving Judiciary square, and for inclosing public reservations.

Mr. SLOAN. I move to amend the bill by adding the following proviso:

Provided, That before any money shall be paid under this act, the city of Washington shall file with the Treasurer of the United States a receipt to the effect that the city has received the amount to be paid by virtue of this act in full of all claims against the Government for grading, paving, and constructing sewers in the streets of said city.

I will state my reason for offering this amendment. The claim which this bill proposes to pay is the same claim which the corporation of Washington presented before the Committee of Ways and Means; and that committee a short time ago reported an appropriation of many thousands of dollars to liquidate this very claim. If this claim is to be presented by the city before different committees of this body, I think it prudent that, when the claim is paid, the Government shall have some voucher to show its liquidation. If we do not take this precaution I have very great doubts whether the payment of this money will either settle the claim or even reduce it. We may have the same claim, swelled to a much larger amount, presented to some future Congress. I trust that the amendment I have offered will meet the approval of the committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I see no objection to the amendment provided it be somewhat modified. The gentleman will understand that these items come down to May 23, 1865, and it was stated before the committee the items here presented and examined covered all the claims of the city against the Government up to that date. I do not think the gentleman, who is a member of the committee, would like to make his amendment so broad as to cover items which were not examined. Whether there has been anything done since that period I do not know; but this covers all of the items examined by that committee, which were said to embrace all the items of the city against the Government. And I think the House will see the impropriety of adopting the amendment as now presented, bringing it down to the present time, when there is not an item in the bill coming down later than the 23d of May, 1865.

Let me say in reference to the report of the committee this: These items have all been presented to the House by the Committee for the District of Columbia. The Committee on Appropriations also made appropriations to pay these same items. Now, the only difference in the report of the Committee of Claims is, that in examining the items we have cut down the claim about six thousand dollars. The items that the Committee of Claims struck out are not all enumerated in the report.

We struck out the item of $2,500 expended in placing an iron fence around Judiciary square. The committee were unanimously of the opinion that the Government furnishing the fence, the city ought to be enough interested in that square to set it up. We thought that item of $2,500 charged for setting up that fence ought not to be charged against the Government, and we therefore struck it out.

We also struck out the item for the improvement of the reservation at I street and Massachusetts avenue. We also struck out $929 for another avenue, and $1,129 for the improvement of another avenue. The committee took the ground, so far as these reservations and avenues were concerned, the land belonging to the Government; if the city saw fit to improve them, then the property-holders living round the improvements should pay for them. We did not think we ought to allow this corporation to take these avenues and reservations and to plant trees all over them, and to make all sorts of improvements, and then come here and make us pay for them. So in all these cases we have stricken out the items for these improvements.

We have, however, followed the law which Congress has passed, that in making the improvement of streets the Government should pay its proportion according to the property it owns bordering on these streets and avenues. We have also allowed the money expended in repairing the Long Bridge, which the Government was bound to repair.

I agree with my colleague, the amendment should be adopted only up to the date of May 23, 1865, to which the bill goes. It was stated before the committee this embraced all the items and charges which the corporation had against the Government down to that date. With that modification I will agree to the amendment.

Mr. SLOAN. The truth is, as I understand, that the city has no legal claim for reimbursement of this money. It incurred this expenditure without authority of law, and I am opposed to recognizing it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. The gentleman is wholly mistaken. That was the case until Congress passed a law that we should pay for the improvements according to the property we owned on these different avenues and reservations. These expenses to that extent, then, were made under the law binding us to pay according to the property we own. We left no charge in the bill not according to law. Some of these expenditures were made at the request of the Commissioner of Public Buildings and Grounds. There is so much for sweeping Pennsylvania avenue. It belonged to the Government to do that; but the Government not having the force necessary to do it at the time needed asked the city to do it. The money was expended in that way. So far as the principal items were concerned, they were all according to a law passed subsequent to the time to which the gentleman refers; and after the money was expended they came before Congress, and a law was passed providing that the Government should pay its proportion of these claims according to the amount of property it owned bordering on these avenues and streets. This is founded simply on that law.

Mr. SLOAN. Was this work done before 1864?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Most of it and I think all of it was done since 1864.

Mr. SLOAN. I think the gentleman from Massachusetts is mistaken; I think the principal portion of the work for which this claim was put in was done before 1864, and some of it many years before; so that I am not mistaken in saying that by the law as it stood when this work was performed the city should only be reimbursed by the Government to the extent of the fund derived from the sale of these lots. It had no right to expect it; it had no claim on the General Government beyond that. The law of 1864 is prospective in its operation, and perhaps binds the Government to pay its ratable proportion of the work thereafter. But we are proposing to pay this money upon a prior claim which has no legal foundation.

As I was about to remark, I am opposed to recognizing the practice on the part of the city or of individuals of going on and expending any amount of money in the expectation that Congress will subsequently legalize their acts and reimburse the amount they have expended. It is time, I think, that we laid down a rule that we will not pay such claims unless there is a law of Congress authorizing the work to be done.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts allow me a word?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Yes, sir.

Mr. INGERSOLL. In my opinion the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SLOAN] is laboring under a misapprehension as to the facts. My recollection is that the original proprietors of the city of Washington donated to the Government of the United States about one thousand lots, and by an act of Congress subsequent to that time the proceeds arising from the sale of the property were to be applied to the liquidation of any claims the city might have for improvements. But instead of applying it in accordance with the original intention and act of Congress, thousands of dollars were paid out of that fund for repairs of the presidential mansion and other purposes. The proceeds of the sale of those lots donated to the Government by the city of Washington were thus diverted instead of being applied to the legitimate claims of the city for improvements. Had the money been applied in accordance with the original intention and act of Congress there would have been no claim of this kind presented here now, and the city to-day would have been vastly in advance of what it is in regard to its improvements. When this improvement was being made it was supposed there were funds enough left from the sale of those lots to pay this claim, and it was supposed that the lots had not all been disposed of; nor were they. After this work was done the Commissioner sold ten lots, if my recollection serves me right, and under that act of Congress paid some eight or ten thousand dollars on that very identical claim, reducing it by that amount. But now this fund has been exhausted by the Government, and the balance of some thirty thousand dollars or more is due to the city.

This claim has been thoroughly examined by the Committee for the District of Columbia, who reported in favor of it. It has been examined also by the Committee on Appropriations, and an appropriation reported once or twice for its liquidation. Upon the motion of some gentleman, who had a very strict regard for the rights of the Government, when it was last reported by the Committee for the District of Columbia, it was referred to the Committee of Claims, knowing that that committee would scrutinize it closely, they having special charge of all claims. If it was not absolutely imperative that they should report in its favor they would report against it. They have examined it for some time—some three months, I believe—and now they have reported in favor of cutting it down five or six thousand dollars, and ask the Government to pay the balance due. Some of it has been due for ten or fifteen years, I think. The city has paid the money to the contractors long ago and had to lose the interest on it.

Now the fact becoming known to a former Congress that this fund had become exhausted and diverted—I might say perverted so far as the act of Congress is concerned—the act of 1864 was passed, which provides that the Government shall pay to the corporation of Washington its equitable proportion of the expenses for the improvement of the city, for laying sewers, paving streets, &c., where the Government has property on the streets thus improved. It is nothing but equitable and just.

Mr. SLOAN. I think I yielded the floor to the gentleman from Illinois, and I will now resume it.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I did not so understand. I understood that I held the floor by the courtesy of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WASHBURN,] who has charge of the bill.

Mr. SLOAN. I yielded the floor to the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understood that the gentleman from Massachusetts had the floor, and yielded it to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I so understood it. I should certainly feel grateful to the gentleman from Wisconsin if he had yielded the floor to me.

Mr. SLOAN. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I will yield for a moment to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] to close his remarks.

Mr. INGERSOLL. That is all I desire.

Mr. SLOAN. The point of order I make is that I was speaking and that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] asked the privilege of making some remarks, and he took the floor from me; and I submit that it is out of order for the Chair to decide that he obtained the floor from the gentleman from Massachusetts.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WASHBURN] had the floor and yielded it to the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. SLOAN,] that the gentleman from Wisconsin finished his remarks, and that the gentleman from Illinois is now occupying the floor by the consent of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. SLOAN. Then I was mistaken. I understood that I was recognized as entitled to the floor.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I will not detain the committee longer than to say that after the careful examination had in reference to this claim by three committees of this House I would deem it an act of injustice longer to withhold the amount due to the city of Washington.

Mr. SLOAN. I only desire to say that my understanding is very different from that of the gentleman from Illinois. I understand that the Government takes the trouble and expense of selling these lots and the proceeds of the sales go to the city.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The gentleman is mistaken in regard to that.

Mr. SLOAN. Most of the cities of this Union purchase grounds for their public parks, and after having purchased them adorn and take care of them. The Government does that for this city, and yet the city claims that the Government shall not only do that, but afterward improve and adorn them. It is asking more than justice requires at the hands of Congress.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts, resumed the floor.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Can I have one minute more?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Well, you may take half a minute.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The reason why the Government of the United States stands in a different position toward this city than the States do toward the cities in their limits is, that Congress has always reserved exclusive jurisdiction over the avenues and streets of the city. The city cannot even lay out a street or alley in this District without the consent of Congress; and having this jurisdiction over the city, we have made ourselves liable for the payment of these claims.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I yield now to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It seems to me that the committee must understand how this question stands. I do not know; I have not been able to ascertain from the report which has been read, nor from the statement made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. WASHBURN,] how this money was expended, or what the proof was that this money had been expended by the city, or whether a fair and reasonable price was paid for the work, or the work was properly done.

This is not the only claim that the city of Washington has of this nature. The committee will recollect that there was an item of $181,000 in one of the appropriation bills for work of this character, which the Committee of the Whole struck out unanimously by the consent of the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. This is not a part of that sum, but it is a kindred claim. It appeared upon examination that the only authority for inserting an appropriation of that large amount of money in an appropriation bill was a mere certificate of the surveyor of the city of Washington. There was no proof whatever made that the work was done in the manner set out; there was no proof that it was done at a fair and reasonable price. I have seen nothing to satisfy me that if the Government is liable to pay anything in this case there is any proof of the amount that we ought to pay.

Now, it seems to me that if this bill is to pass it ought to pass with an amendment which I will suggest, and which should precede the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. SLOAN,] which I think is a very proper one. The amendment which I would suggest is to the effect that before any money is paid under this bill the proper accounting officers of the Treasury shall make a full examination of all the items, and receive proof that the work was done at fair and reasonable prices. I think this is the least that can be done, if we are going to act upon this matter at all. I think it should undergo some sort of investigation further than it has undergone already—a judicial investigation to some extent. Let the whole question be investigated, and let testimony be taken to show, if there is really any liability, what the extent of that liability is.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I have no objection to the amendment indicated by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. WASHBURN,] I only desire to say that so far as the Committee of Claims were concerned they could not go into a personal examination of all these items. But the Commissioner of Public Buildings appeared before them, and the question was put to him in regard to all these different items whether they had thus been examined. He replied that they had all been examined; that surveys had been made by the engineer on the part of the Government in order to ascertain if possible whether the amounts charged against the Government were proper; and that all the different items had been thus examined. It was upon that information that the committee acted. But I am perfectly willing that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] should be adopted should the House consider it best to do so. I simply desired to state that the testimony upon which the Committee of Claims acted was to the effect that all those different items had been fully examined.

Mr. DELANO. I hope the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] will be adopted. The committee who have reported this claim have not done so out of any feeling of favoritism toward the city of Washington, or from any opinion that the city of Washington had very strong claims upon the Government. We have examined this account with these feelings, and have rejected from it every item which we felt we could reject with justice. I desire to move an amendment to the amendment of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. SLOAN.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. Will not the gentleman permit the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] to be first offered?

Mr. DELANO. Is the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SLOAN] now pending?

The CHAIRMAN, (Mr. PRICE in the chair.) It is.

Mr. DELANO. I would suggest to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SLOAN] to withdraw his amendment until the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] can be offered and acted upon.

Mr. SLOAN. I will do so, with the understanding that I shall have an opportunity to renew it.

Mr. DELANO. I will renew it myself if necessary.

Mr. SLOAN. I withdraw my amendment. Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now move to amend this bill by adding the following:

Provided further, That no money shall be paid under this act until after a full examination of all the items by the proper accounting officer of the Treasury, and proof under oath that the work was done at fair and reasonable prices.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SLOAN. I now move to further amend this bill by adding the following:

And provided further, That before any money shall be paid under this act the city of Washington shall file with the Treasurer of the United States a receipt to the effect that the city has received the amount to be paid by virtue of this act, in full of all claims against the Government for the grading, paving, and constructing sewers in the streets of the city of Washington.

Mr. DELANO. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. SLOAN] by adding to it the words "to the date of May 5, 1864."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] to say May 23, 1865.

Mr. DELANO. The law is dated May 5, 1864.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. The last item of this bill is under date of May 23, 1865.

Mr. DELANO. Very well; I will modify my amendment as the gentleman suggests. I will now simply state my reasons for this amendment. Under the act of May 15, 1820, the Commissioner of Public Buildings was authorized to pay, out of a certain fund that was expected to arise from the sale of city lots, the Government proportion of the expense of improving the streets, &c., of this city. The exhaustion of that fund has rendered the Commissioner unable to pay what accrued under that act up to the date of the passage of the general law of May 5, 1864, by which it was provided that in future, from May 16, 1864, the proportion of these expenses properly chargeable to the property of the Government should be paid by the United States. This account is for the Government's proportion of these expenses arising previous to the passage of this law and under the law of 1820. We have sifted these charges with as much care as we could bestow upon them, and we believe that we have reduced them to as low an amount as they can be reduced to hereafter. These expenses are to be paid under the law of 1864; and it is proper that the city should give the Government a receipt in full for all expenses up to 1864.

This is all there is of the case. I hope the Committee of the Whole will concur in the action of the Committee of Claims, for I think we shall never get the claim in a more favorable shape for the Government.

The amendment of Mr. DELANO to the amendment of Mr. SLOAN was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was adopted.

Mr. UPSON. I move further to amend the bill by adding the following as a new section:

And be it further enacted, That section three of an act entitled "An act to amend an act to incorporate the inhabitants of the city of Washington, passed May 15, 1820," approved May 5, 1864, be, and the same is hereby, repealed."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I must object that this is not a proper amendment to this bill. We have spent considerable time upon this bill, and I think it is now in as good a shape as it is likely to be hereafter if we reject it at the present time. If the House sees fit to reject the bill, let it be done fairly. But let us not undertake to attach to the bill an irrelevant provision for the repeal of an existing law.

Mr. UPSON. If the gentleman from Massachusetts still holds the floor, I desire that he may yield to me a few moments that I may explain the purpose which my amendment is designed to accomplish. Its object is to avoid incurring the expenditure—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts. I do not yield to the gentleman. I submit the point of order that the amendment is not pertinent to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

TULLER AND FISHER.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 175) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to audit and pay the claim of Tuller & Fisher.

The joint resolution was read. The preamble recites that the horses, coaches, stage property, and means of transportation of Messrs. Owen Tuller and Ulysses E. Fisher, mail contractors on mail route No. 10648, between Springfield and Rolla, in Missouri, were impressed in the military service and taken possession of and used by competent military authority, by reason of which a large amount of such property was captured by the enemy and lost to the contractors.

The joint resolution proposes to authorize and require the Secretary of the Treasury to have the claim of Tuller & Fisher audited, and to pay to them out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated the amount that shall be found due them for such losses, not exceeding $12,500.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the reading of the report.

The report was read.

Mr. THORNTON. This resolution proposes merely to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to audit this claim. The only question which the case presents is whether the Government will pay for property seized for its use and the use of its Army during the recent war. It appears very clearly from the proof in this case that the claimants were contractors to carry the mail from Rolla to Springfield; that the parties had determined to abandon the contract, to give it up in consequence of the interference of armed rebels with their coaches and horses; that in consequence of this determination on the part of the contractors the military authorities interfered, compelled them to continue the carrying of the mails, and refused to permit them to remove their horses and coaches from the route. The carrying of the mail was continued under the orders of the military authority, these contractors being allowed no option in the case. The simple question is, will Congress authorize the auditing of this claim and the payment of these parties for horses and coaches thus taken from them? I hope this resolution will be laid aside to be reported to the House.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was up the other day, when we were last in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, I opposed its being considered at that time; and I am to-day opposed to the passage of this bill.

It seems here are certain contractors of the State of Indiana who make a claim against this Government for horses and coaches lost in carrying the mails of the United States in the State of Missouri. I have no doubt of the truth of the facts set forth in the report. It may also be that in equity these parties are entitled to relief from the Government; but the objection I make is, that we should not make this an exceptional case when every mail contractor in Missouri since 1861 has a similar claim that the Government seized and took possession of this property. There are thousands of individuals who are in the same condition, and yet they are not paid because of the rule which was adopted by this House on the report of the Committee of Claims. I know of no difference between a mail-carrier and any other person. The Government seized the property of men who were loyal, of men who were fighting the battles of the country. Their property in horses and other things was captured by the enemy, yet, sir, not a dollar can they get.

This case has no greater merit than those of the railroads which the Government seized and compelled to transport troops and munitions of war. Thousands and millions of property were seized belonging to these railroads. They can get nothing from the Government.

As I have said, every mail-carrier in the border States suffered irreparable losses, indeed were made bankrupt, by the action of our Government. I therefore oppose this being made an exceptional case. If we are going to enter into these claims there should be some general law passed. Some commission should be appointed to investigate them and to report to this Congress. While we are legislating for one we should legislate for all. If we set a precedent by the passage of this bill, we all know there are thousands of like cases which will come to the Committee of Claims. I am opposed to the passage of one until we can pass all. I know nothing in this case which will take it out of the rule we have adopted in other cases.

Then we may object to this on account of the amount appropriated. This is an ex parte hearing only of the claimants. The amount might be reduced on investigation.

Mr. THORNTON. I call the gentleman's attention to the resolution itself. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to audit the claim and to pay the amount found to be due on full investigation.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not know that it moves my objection. We know the Secretary of the Treasury is not going out to hunt up testimony. We know the claimants are the only parties who will be represented before him. If we are going to legislate upon these matters let us do it by general law.

Mr. DRIGGS. I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I approve the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri, not because I am opposed to the recognition of these claims as a matter of right, but because we discriminate against all similar claims, some of which have as much if not more merit than the one now before the House. I need only remind gentlemen of the case of Mr. Bingham, of Alabama, a loyal man who suffered everything during the war. He furnished provisions for our forces as they passed through Alabama. He presented a small claim for $1,800, and yet the committee reported against it. For a little while after coming to Washington he held a clerkship, but he has been removed because I suppose he is a radical. You refuse to pay him although he is now destitute, while you propose to pay these claimants.

As the gentleman from Missouri says, if we open the door we should establish the same rule in reference to all of these parties. Then the question comes up, are we able at the present time to open the door to so many as will present themselves? I will be as willing as any gentleman upon the floor to recognize and pay these claimants when we can do it; but I do not think it right to discriminate in favor of these individuals when so many of equal merit are cut off by our rule.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I agree with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] and the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. DRIGGS] that there are cases of great hardship that cannot be reached at present. The case of Bingham comes under the resolution which this House adopted, that parties in the insurgent States, until they are reconstructed, shall wait for the adjustment of their claims. Their claims may be just and right; but the House has decided that being so unfortunate as to reside in a State in rebellion they must wait a short time before they can be adjusted.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Does the gentleman say that the State of Missouri was in rebellion?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I am not speaking of any claims of my friend from Missouri. I mentioned no claim in particular but that of Mr. Bingham, of Alabama, which was referred to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will merely state that Missouri never was in rebellion, and there are thousands of claims in that State unadjusted.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. But, sir, they have been and are being paid. A commission has been appointed and sent out, and they are getting their pay every day.

Now to the case in point. There are no objections to this claim, I believe, on the ground of justice. What then is the objection? The only objection that my friend from Missouri [Mr. BENJAMIN] has made, as I understand, is because a loyal citizen of Indiana brings it; and as an offset against it he says that people in Missouri have many claims that have not been paid. Sir, if they are honest and just I am for paying every dollar of them. And so I say if this is an honest and just claim it ought to be paid. You cannot dodge it by saying you have not the money. We are never too poor to do justice, and if we wish to sustain ourselves and our reputation when we admit the justice of a claim we should if possible pay it. I am not now speaking in regard to southern claims, because from the necessity of the case they must wait a little while. But in regard to claims of loyal men in the loyal States they ought to be paid without delay.

I know something about this claim by personal experience. Our troops were in Arkansas and southwestern Missouri. Our mails were stopped and regulations had to be made by which the military trains carried them, and had it not been for the mail contractors our mails would have been left behind. It may be thought that it would amount to a very little, but I tell you it amounted to a great deal with us there. Owing to the dangers that surrounded them, seeing that they were to be interrupted, the contractors said, "We cannot carry out our contract: we must take our stock out of the reach of the guerrillas and of the enemy." But the military authorities said, "No; you must go and perform the work, notens volens: we will put an escort over the mail trains." They went on and the mail trains were captured. And now when they come here with their claim we are told by some gentlemen that they should not be paid. I say it is a just claim, and should be paid without delay.

Mr. HILL. This bill is reported from the Committee of Claims, whose duty it is to investigate all claims referred to them, and it is but justice to that committee to presume that they have fairly investigated it. When they report favorably upon a claim I am disposed to consider their report fairly and candidly.

Now, in regard to the character of this particular claim, I understand it is for damages sustained by reason of the loss of stock. The Government with a high hand takes possession of horses and conveyances and uses them for its own purposes. Now, is it to be held that the Government is a grand pirate that lays its hand upon anything it wants, and the owner is to stand by without resistance and without redress, and that we, the only body that can afford redress, while admitting the justice of the claim in point of law and of every principle of right, cannot give relief? Why, sir, a Government of that character is not worth preserving. If a Government cannot afford to pay for property that it appropriates to its own use, and for its preservation in time of peril, it is time it should cease to exist, and be superseded by another that can do justice. Instead of being a protection to the citizen it is the citizen's most severe oppressor.

Now, sir, why is it that property so taken should not be paid for? I see no reason in the world. The Government is paying thousands and millions of dollars under contract for property where it purchased such property as this. If this principle which has been suggested is to be acted on, and property is not to be paid for under such circumstances as these, why does not the Government turn itself into a grand horse-stealing enterprise, and when claimants come before this House tell them that their claims are just enough, but that it would bankrupt the Government to pay them?

As my colleague says, this Government is certainly able to do right. If we have not the money to pay just claims, let them at least be audited, and let the claimant know that at some time he will receive his compensation, instead of telling him that we sustain Government officers in the exercise of a little temporary authority in taking property whenever and wherever they please, for which no compensation shall be paid to him. I insist that to refuse the payment of claims of this character would be worse than a bankruptcy of the Government, for it would bring the Government into contempt in the minds of all honest men.

Mr. INGERSOLL. If I understand this matter the Committee of Claims is acting upon the theory that the people of the States which were declared to be in rebellion became public enemies, and that consequently under the laws of war all property captured within their territory became the property of the captor, without compensation to the owner.

So far as the matter now in question is concerned, it is claimed that Mr. Bingham, who was a loyal citizen of Alabama, and who may have been ever so true and loyal a citizen, was in the eye of the law a "public enemy," and his property liable to capture. But, as I understand it, the case does not fall under that rule. The State of Missouri was never declared in rebellion. It was in the eye of the law as loyal a State as Indiana or Illinois, and these citizens of Indiana took a contract to carry the mails within the limits of that State. They found after awhile that danger threatened; rebel guerrillas surrounded them; and they notified the Government that they wished to withdraw their property to a place of safety. They were denied that privilege by an officer of the United States, and their property was seized by Government officers, and the property used in carrying the mails upon the route for which they had the contract. These loyal citizens are now denied pay for property thus taken for the use of the Government.

Now, gentlemen tell us that if we recognize such claims as this it will bankrupt the Government and that there are other claims awaiting the action of Congress upon this which will be passed if this be allowed. Sir, will it bankrupt the Government to pay its honest debts? If I am a citizen of such a Government, I want to be a citizen of it no longer. If the Government cannot pay its debts now, let it give its note. It can do that much.

If the report of the committee is true, these men are entitled to this money, or to as much of it as may be found due. The bill involves the principle of the Government paying its debts. It does not involve the principle of paying for property taken by the enemy, or from the enemy, but only the principle of paying citizens of the United States for property taken from them by the Government for the use of the Government. The Government has no more right to refuse the payment of this claim—and I base my remarks on the report—than it would have to refuse payment for horses furnished under contract for a regiment raised in the State of Illinois.

Sir, I hold that this Government cannot afford to cover itself with dishonor by refusing to pay to its loyal citizens the value of that property which the Government deemed it necessary to deprive them of in the prosecution of the great work of putting down the rebellion.

These remarks I do not extend to the case of citizens who unfortunately resided within the enemy's territory, within the eleven States declared to be in rebellion. But I place a loyal citizen of Missouri upon the same footing with a loyal citizen of Illinois, and I imagine if these citizens of the United States who are pressing this claim were residents of the Galena district, which my colleague [Mr. WASHBURN] has the honor to represent here, you would hear him for once advocate the payment of a just debt. Now, I am not in favor of straining our ideas of equity in order to embrace all those who may unfortunately have resided within the enemy's territory during the rebellion. But I would manifest the high generosity of the Government toward that spirit of loyalty that was awakened by the appeal of the nation to its children to come up and defend it; to all the loyal citizens of all the loyal States. But you cannot do that by denying to pay them their just claims.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I desire to say but a few words upon this subject about which my colleague [Mr. INGERSOLL] seems to have worked himself into quite a passion. I do not know why he considered it necessary to refer to me, and to say that if this claim had been made by citizens of the Galena district I would be found supporting it here. I can only say that there has been no claim presented here by citizens of the Galena district that I have supported since my colleague has been here.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I made the remark by way of compliment to my colleague, for I never knew him to fail to advocate any claim that came from the Galena district, and very properly, I have no doubt.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I do not know that I have advocated any particular claim from the Galena district, or from any other district either. But I have heard considerable said by my colleague [Mr. INGERSOLL] and by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. WASHBURN] in regard to the duty of this Government. Why say that if this Government shall not do so and so, shall not pay this, that, or the other claim that is presented, the Government will be dishonored and disgraced; that this claim is honest and just, and if the Government does not come forward and plank down the money, or give its note for sixty or ninety days, it would be no just Government at all? Now, I take issue with those gentlemen in regard to what is the character of this Government. I think it is the most just, the most honest, the most liberal, and the most beneficent Government on the face of the earth. I think our legislation here is characterized by more liberality than that of any other Government in the world. I think more claims get through our Congress here, upon less evidence and with less real justice, than are allowed by any other legislative body.

Now, one word in regard to this claim. I think we should act in regard to it as Representatives who are sent here by our constituents to guard their interests; we should endeavor to ascertain whether or not we can pass this claim in justice to them; whether or not, should we pass it, we would not be reversing all the principles upon which we have heretofore acted since the rebellion broke out.

Now, what is this claim? It appears, so far as I could gather from hearing the report read, that there were some gentlemen—very honest and patriotic and loyal gentlemen, I have no doubt, for they were from Indiana. And Indiana has been heard upon that question; nobody will doubt her loyalty since she has sent back here such Representatives as she sends here. These gentlemen contracted to carry the mails in the State of Missouri. It seems that their route lay through the enemy's country, and they did not want to carry the mails while the bushwhackers were about. I do not blame them much for that; for I confess that I would not have desired to be there then. It was insisted, however, that they should perform their contract; and the military authorities there, in order to protect them, sent an escort with them to guard the mails. But the escort was not sufficient for that purpose, as I understand my friend from Indiana, [Mr. WASHBURN.]

And what next? The property of these perfectly loyal gentlemen from the State of Indiana was captured by the public enemy. And now they come here and ask us to do, what? Why, sir, to pay them for property captured by the public enemy. Sir, as I understand it, that is what we have in every case refused to do.

If we pass this bill and adopt this principle, we depart from the well-established rule of international law. No Government on the face of the earth has ever undertaken to pay for damages arising from the casualties of war. No Government could meet the expenditures which would be incurred in that way.

This whole question has been discussed in Congress a great many times—I will not say by abler men than there are here now—but it was discussed fifty years ago by the ablest men in Congress at that time, when persons came forward claiming compensation for damages incurred during the war of 1812.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to call his attention to a portion of the report in this case, which seems to have escaped his attention.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I will hear it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. The report states:

"At this period, and at least as early as the 1st of March, 1863, Colonel S. N. Boyd, then a military officer in the volunteer service of the United States, and since a member of this House from Missouri, in conjunction with other citizens, applied to the commanding officer of that military department and obtained an order taking possession of their horses, wagons, staves, harness, forage; of all their means of transportation and stores used in the mail service on said route, and applied the same to military use and purposes of the Government."

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I was perfectly aware of what is there stated, and was coming to that very point. That raises another question: whether a military commander can seize the property of anybody he pleases for any purpose he pleases, whether good or bad, and render the Government liable? I contend that the Government is not liable. I contend that Colonel Boyd, a patriotic gentleman, who was a member of the last Congress, had no authority to bind this Government.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. It was not he that issued the order; he obtained an order from the proper military authority.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. That makes no difference. I concede that he was the proper military authority; but that is immaterial. I say that the Government is not bound by these orders of military commanders. I think it unsafe for us to adopt a rule which would render the Government liable for the action of its military commanders. I do not think this House will ever adopt such a rule.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. THORNTON] to yield to me for a moment, that I may make an explanation.

Mr. THORNTON. I yield to the gentleman for one minute.

Mr. INGERSOLL. My colleague [Mr. WASHBURN] has—of course, without intending it—done me injustice. I did not say that this Government would act dishonorably if it refused to pay this claim. I did, however, make the remark that if the Government of the United States should repudiate its honest debts it would be dishonored; and I reiterate it. I agree fully with all that my colleague has said with regard to the liberality, the magnanimity, and the grandeur of this Government; and I feel an interest in maintaining its honor, so that its grandeur and glory may continue undimmed and may grow more resplendent. I am here, not alone to guard the Treasury of the United States, not alone to protect the interest of my immediate constituents, but to preserve, so far as I may be able, the honor of the whole country.

Mr. THORNTON. I now yield for a few moments to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. DELANO.]

Mr. DELANO. Mr. Chairman, I desire to state to the committee in as few words as possible the facts which control this case.

On the question of the assumption of liabilities by the Government much has been said with which I do not agree. I think that cases of this sort are best argued by presenting simply and clearly the facts on which they rest. The claimants in this case were contractors before the war for carrying the mail in Missouri. After the war broke out the troubled condition of affairs in that State rendered it, as they saw, almost impossible for them to continue to carry the mail—certainly impossible without subjecting themselves to terrible losses by the loss or destruction of their property. Under these circumstances they applied to the Government to be released from making the effort to carry the mail. The Government declined to release them. The mail service was considered so important that the Government insisted they should go on and do the best they could, promising them all the aid that could be given by the troops of the United States. They went on and carried the mails; and in doing so they suffered heavy losses. Their horses and coaches were captured.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DELANO. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Did not these contractors receive from the Government their regular pay as contractors?

Mr. DELANO. The Government, as I understand, paid them the contract price, but no extra pay.

Mr. BOUTWELL. They went on as contractors?

Mr. DELANO. They went on as contractors under the contract. Of course they went on at the importunity of the Government. They were not permitted to surrender their contract. The Government paid them, I am told, only for the trips actually made. The question arises whether the parties who have attempted to serve the Government under such circumstances when service was demanded, and who have sustained inevitable losses thereby, are to be paid. The committee agreed that this mail service was important to the Government. The committee thought it was one of the simplest cases, but the House can draw its own conclusions. It has nothing to do with the claims of disloyal States or of loyal States under the rule adopted by the House. It is simply whether these contractors, who entered into a contract before the war, who went on after the war being promised the aid of the Government, who sustained all this loss, should be paid for it by the Government.

One other view of this subject. If this could be said to be for property destroyed by the enemy in the ordinary sense of the term I would not vote for it. A private citizen can make no claim for property destroyed by the enemy. He must take his chance. As God orders, so he must endure. These parties suffered these losses while serving the Government at the importunity of the Government, and I do not think the case stands in the line of the principle alluded to. The resolution simply provides what they have actually lost in the effort to serve the Government shall be ascertained by the proper accounting officers and paid. That is all.

The joint resolution was laid aside, to be reported to the House with the recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. STEVENS moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PRICE reported that the Committee of the Whole House had according to order had the Private Calendar generally under consideration, and had directed him to report the following bills and joint resolution to the House, with the recommendation that they do pass:

A bill (H. R. No. 710) to pay and discharge certain debts and expenditures to the corporation of the city of Washington;

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 175) to audit and pay the claim of Tuller & Fisher, of Missouri; and

A bill (S. No. 311) for the relief of James Pool.

EVENING SESSION.

Mr. INGERSOLL moved that the House take a recess from half past four o'clock till half past seven o'clock p. m., for the purpose of having an evening session to be devoted to debate only.

The motion was agreed to.

DEBTS DUE TO WASHINGTON CITY.

The SPEAKER. The first bill reported from the Committee of the Whole House is House bill No. 710, to pay and discharge certain debts and expenditures to the corporation of the city of Washington, with an amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

TULLER AND FISHER.

The question next recurred on House joint resolution No. 175, to audit and pay the claim of Tuller & Fisher, of Missouri, and also reported from the Committee of the Whole House with a recommendation that it do pass.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. BENJAMIN demanded the yeas and nays on the passage of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 75, nays 37, not voting 79; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Banks, Barker, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Reader W. Clarke, Davis, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Denison, Dixon, Eldridge, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Goodyear, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hayes, Henderson, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Whaley, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—79.

During the roll-call—

Mr. LE BLOND stated that Mr. HARRIS was detained from the House in consequence of the illness of his wife.

Mr. HOGAN. I desire to state that my colleague, Mr. NOELL, is unable to be present.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I wish to state that my colleague, Mr. STROUSE, is absent in consequence of sickness in his family.

The vote having been announced as above recorded,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES POOL.

The last bill reported from the Committee of the Whole was Senate bill No. 311, for the relief of James Pool.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

ENROLLED BILL AND RESOLUTION SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill and joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 964,) in regard to the compensation of route agents in the Post Office Department.

Joint resolution (H. R. No. 229,) to procure a site for a building to accommodate the post office and United States courts in New York city.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The House resumed the consideration of House bill No. 543, to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights, on which Mr. DONNELLY was entitled to the floor.

Mr. DONNELLY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to express myself in favor of the main purposes of the bill now under consideration.

Through the clouds of a great war and the confusion of a vast mass of uncertain legislation we are at length reaching something tangible; we have passed the "Serbonian bog," and are approaching good dry land.

This is the logical conclusion of the war. The war was simply the expression of the determination of the nation to subordinate the almost unanimous will of the white people of the rebellious States to the unity and prosperity of the whole country. Having gone thus far we cannot pause. We must still subordinate their wishes to our welfare.

This bill proposes to commence at the very foundation and build upward.

We have the assurance of President Johnson that "the rebellion has in its revolutionary progress deprived the rebellious States of all civil government," and that their State institutions have been "prostrated and laid out upon the ground."

In such a state of anarchy and disorganization the very foundations of society are laid bare; and we reach, as it were, the primary rocks, the everlasting granite of justice and right which underlies all human government. In the language of the great Edmund Burke:

"When men break up the original compact or agreement which gives its corporate form and capacity to a State they are no longer a people; they have no longer a corporate existence; they have no longer a legal coercive force to bind within, nor a claim to be recognized abroad. They are a number of vague, loose individuals, and nothing more; with them all is to begin again. Alas! they little know how many a weary step is to be taken before they can form themselves into a mass which has a true political personality."—Burke's Works, vol. iii, p. 82.

I shall not stop to consider the objection made to the second section of the bill by the gentleman from Wisconsin, [Mr. PAINE.] With the purpose and intent of his remarks I thoroughly concur. I conclude, however, that the object of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] in providing for such a partial and temporary recognition of the rebel governments, was to protect society from the evils of a total abrogation of all law and order. But it seems to me that whatever binding force those governments can have, founded as they are upon revolution and by the hands of revolutionary agents, is to be derived solely from such recognition as Congress may give them. It may be possible in this and other particulars to perfect the bill. I desire to speak rather to its general scope and purpose.

Government having, by the acknowledgment of the President, ceased to exist, law being swept aside, and chaos having come again in those rebellious States, by what principle shall the law-making power of the nation—the Congress—govern itself? Shall it bend its energies to renew old injustice? Shall it receive to its fraternal embrace only that portion of the population which circumstance or accident or century-old oppression may have brought to the surface? Shall it—having broken up the armies and crushed the hopes of the rebels—pander to their bigotries and cringe to their prejudices? Shall it hesitate to do right out of deference to the sentiments of those who but a short time since were mowed down at the mouths of its cannon?

It is to my mind most clear that slavery having ceased to exist the slaves became citizens; being citizens they are a part of the people; and being a part of the people no organization deserves a moment's consideration at our hands which attempts to ignore them. If they were white people whom it was thus sought to disfranchise and outlaw not a man in the nation would dare to say nay to this proposition; every impulse of our hearts would rise up in indignant remonstrance against their oppressors. But it has pleased Almighty God, who takes counsel of no man, not even of the founders of the rebellion, to paint them of a different complexion, and that variation in the pigmentum macum is to rise up as a perpetual barrier in our pathway toward equal justice and equal rights.

For one, with the help of God, I propose to do what I know to be right in the face of all prejudices and all obstructions; and so long as I have a seat in this body I shall never vote to reconstruct any rebellious State on any such basis of cruelty and injustice as that proposed by the Opposition here.

Take the case of South Carolina. She has three hundred thousand whites and four hundred thousand blacks; and we are asked to hand over the four hundred thousand blacks to the unrestrained custody and control of the three hundred thousand whites. We are to know no one but the whites; to communicate with no one but the whites; this floor is to recognize no one but white Representatives of the whites. The whites are to make the laws, execute the laws, interpret the laws, and write the history of their own deeds; but below them, under them, there is to be a vast population—a majority of the whole people—seething and writhing in a condition of suffering, darkness, and wretchedness unparalleled in the world. And this is to be an American State! This is to be a component part of the great, humane, Christian Republic of the world. This is to be the protection the mighty Republic is to deal out to its poor black friends who were faithful to it in its hour of trial; this is the punishment it is to inflict upon its perfidious enemies.

No, sir, no sophistry, no special pleading, can lead the American people to this result. Through us or over us it will reconstruct those States on a basis of impartial and eternal justice. Such a mongrel, patchwork, bastard reconstruction as some gentlemen propose, even if put into shape, would not hold together a twelvemonth. Four million human beings consigned to the uncontrolled brutality of seven other million of human beings! The very thought is monstrous. The instinct of justice which God has implanted in every soul revolts at it. The voice of lamentation would swell up from that wretched land and fill the ears of mankind. Leaders and avengers would spring up on every hill-top of the North. The intellect, the morality, the soul of the age would fight in behalf of the oppressed, and the structure of so-called reconstruction would go down in blood.

Does any man think that it is in the American people, who rose at the cry of the slave under the lash of his master, to abide in quiet the carnival of arson, rapine, and murder now raging over the South? Sir, a Government which would perpetuate such a state of things would be a monstrous barbarism; the legislative body which would seek to weave such things into the warp and woof of the national life would deserve the vengeance of Almighty God.

A Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. COWAN] the other day in the United States Senate said:

"I have no doubt but there are large numbers of the American people who are exceedingly anxious to compel negro suffrage through the southern States. But has any one of them ever made an argument to show that the southern States would be better governed; that there would be more peace and more quiet in consequence of it? I have never heard those arguments if they have been made, and I do not know how anybody could make them."

I will give the honorable Senator an argument, most potent and convincing, as to the kind of "peace and quiet" which now reign in the South without negro suffrage, and which will reign there so long as negro suffrage is denied. General Ord has just made a report upon the condition of things in Arkansas. He sums up matters as follows:

"Outrages, assaults, and murders committed on the persons of freed men and women are being continually reported from all sections of the State, and a decided want of disposition to punish offenders apparently exists with the local civil officers and in the minds of the people. There have been reported fifty-two murders of freed persons by white men in this State in the past three or four months, and no reports have been received that the murderers have been imprisoned or punished. In some parts of the State, particularly in the southwest and southeast, freedmen's lives are threatened if they report their wrongs to the agent of the bureau, and in many instances the parties making reports are missed and never heard of afterward. It is believed that the number of murders reported is not half the number committed during the time mentioned."

Or if this is not sufficient, I would answer the distinguished Senator still farther by quoting from the report of the officers of the Freedmen's Bureau as to the state of affairs in Tennessee as a further testimony to the condition of southern society without impartial suffrage:

"Captain Kendrick reports in substance that having proceeded to Union City he conversed with many of the citizens, who told him that but few freedmen were left about there, as they were driving them away as rapidly as possible. There seems to be a fixed determination that the freedmen shall not reside there, and the citizens force them to fly by ravishing the females, shooting, beating, whipping, and cheating them. The superintendent of the bureau there, while investigating a case of assault upon a negro, was compelled to desist by threats upon his life. The magistrate of the town states that he is powerless to administer justice, owing to the feeling in the community. Captain Kendrick mentions the case of a freedwoman named Emeline, living in Union City, who, during the absence of her husband, was brutally violated by a party of whites. She appealed to the justice of the peace, who informed her that nothing could be done for her on account of the feeling in the town. The next day two men, named Goodlow and Avons, of Union City, together into a field and whipped her. A freedman named Callum was whipped by a man named Stanley for saying that he had fought in the Union army. A Mr. Roscol, county trustee, has been persistently persecuted by a gang of desperadoes because he was prominent in defending the Union, and has been shot at several times while sitting in his house. About a dozen bullet holes may be seen in his door. At Troy the freedmen are getting on prosperously and have no complaints to make. The feeling of hostility toward northern men at this place, the captain reports, is more bitter even than at Union City. Loyal citizens are waylaid and shot, and the ruffians escape punishment. A man named Hancock was called out of church, where he had just experienced religion, by a Dr. Marshall, who told him two persons outside wished to see him. When he had gone a short distance two men named Carruthers attacked and severely beat him with clubs because Hancock wore a Federal uniform coat. Several other cases of outrage of an aggravated character, and even murder, are reported by Captain Kendrick, and those who are thus maltreated dare not utter a word of complaint through fear of the desperadoes. He recommends that a detachment of troops be permanently stationed in this county, and says that matters will grow worse instead of better until it is done."

I find in the morning papers the following letter, which explains itself:

HEADQUARTERS DEPARTMENT OF THE SOUTH,
CHARLESTON, SOUTH CAROLINA, January 10, 1867.

GENERAL: According to an article in the Charleston Daily News of this morning, it appears that the jail at Kingstree, South Carolina, has been destroyed by fire, and twenty-two colored prisoners smothered or burned to death, while the only white prisoner was permitted to escape. The article states that the jailer, who had the keys, refused to open the doors without the authority of the sheriff, and the sheriff refused to act without the orders of the lieutenant commanding the troops at Kingstree. This statement presents a degree of barbarity that would appear incredible except in a community where no value is placed upon the lives of colored citizens. The general commanding directs that you cause an immediate and thorough investigation of this affair; that in the mean time you arrest the sheriff and jailer, and if the facts prove to be as stated, that you hold them in military confinement, under the charge of murder, until the civil authorities shall be ready and willing to try them.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,
J. W. CLOUS,
Brevet Captain and First Lieutenant Sixth Infantry,
Acting Assistant Adjutant General.
Brevet Major General H. K. SCOTT,
Com. Mil. Com., South Carolina.

I might fill pages with similar testimony, but it is not required.

It is too evident that when you strip a man of all means of self-defense, either through the courts or the laws, deprive him of education and leave him to the mercy of his fellow men, he must suffer all the pangs which our unworthy human nature is capable of inflicting. Who is there believes that man can safely intrust himself solely and alone to the mercy of his fellow man? Let such a one step forward and select his master! Let him in the wide circle of the world choose out that man—pure, just and humane—upon whose vast, all-embracing charity he can throw the burden of his life. Alas! there is no such man.

Life is a perpetual struggle even under the most favorable circumstances; an unending fight of man against man,

"For some slight plank whose weight will bear but one!"

And occasionally how monstrous and horrible are the giant selfishnesses which start up under our feet like ghouls and affrights!

History is the record of the gradual amelioration of deep-rooted, ancient injustice. What a hard, long, bloody, terrible fight it has been! But for the fact that our national organization rests upon a basis of new colonizations we would not possess the large measure of liberty we now enjoy; we would be as are the old lands of the world, still weighed down by the burdens of feudality and barbarism. But being peopled by the overflows of the poor laboring people of Europe, who left the errors and prejudices of the Old World in mid-ocean, we have started upon our career of national greatness on the grand basis of the perfect political equality of all men.

We cannot fail to recognize the all-fashioning hand of God as clearly in this sublime declaration as in the geologic eras, the configuration of the continents, or the creation of man himself. What a world of growth has already budded and flowered and borne fruit from this seed! What an incalculable world of growth is to arise from it in the future!

Now, then, comes the question to each of us, by what rule shall we reconstruct these prostrated and well nigh desolated States? Shall it be by the august rule of the Declaration of Independence; or shall we bend our energies to perpetuate injustice, cruelty, and oppression; and make of this fair Government a monstrosity, with golden words of promise upon its banners, a fair seeming upon its surface, but a hideous and inhuman despotism within it; the Christianity and civilization of the nineteenth century crystalized into a nation with Dahomey and Timbuctoo in its bowels! A living lie, a rotten pretense, a mockery, and a sham, with death in its heart.

There are but two forms of government in the world: injustice, armed and powerful and taking to itself the shape of king or aristocracy; and, on the other hand, absolute human justice, resting upon the broad and enduring basis of equal rights to all. Give this and give intelligence and education to understand it and you have a structure which will stand while the world stands. Anything else than this is mere repression, the piling of rocks into the mouth of the volcano, which sooner or later will fling them to the skies.

What is this equality of rights? It is the prescribing of a limit to human selfishness. It is the hospital measure which gives so many feet of breathing space to each man in the struggle for life. I must not intrude upon my neighbor's limit nor he upon mine. It is universal selfishness regulated by a sentiment of universal justice; fair play recognized as a common necessity. Break down this barrier and the great waves sweep in and all is anarchy. Hear Motley's description of society in the ancient time, ere this principle arose "to curb the great and raise the lowly:"

"The sword is the only symbol of the law, the cross is a weapon of offense, the bishop a consecrated pirate, and every petty baron a burglar: while the people alternately the prey of duke, prelate, and seignior, shorn and butchered like sheep, esteem it happiness to sell themselves into slavery, or to huddle beneath the castle walls of some little potentate for the sake of his wolfish protection."—Rise of the Dutch Republic, p. 14.

Sir, all history teaches us that man would be safer in the claws of wild beasts than in the uncontrolled custody of his fellow-men. And can any man doubt that he who lives in a community and has no share in the making of the laws which govern him is in the uncontrolled custody of those who make the laws? The courts simply interpret the laws, and what will it avail a man to appeal to the courts if the laws under every interpretation are against him? Set a man down in the midst of a community, place the mark of Cain upon his brow, declare him an outlaw, take from him every protection, and you at once invite everything base, sordid, and abominable in human nature to rise up and assail him. Is there any man within the sound of my voice who thinks so highly of our common humanity that he would dare trust himself in such a position for a day or for an hour? But if to this you superadd the fact that the poor wretch so stripped of all protection was but the other day a bondman, and was forcibly wrested from the hands of his master, and that to the common sordidness of our nature must be added the inflamed feelings growing out of a long civil war and the wrath and bitterness begotten of disappointed cupidity, you have a condition of things at which the very soul shudders. But this is not all; you must go a step further; and remember that the poor wretch who thus stands helpless, chained, and naked in the midst of his mortal foes was our true, loyal, and faithful friend in the day of our darkness and calamity; and that those who now flock around him like vultures gathering to the carnage were but the other day our deadly enemies and sought our destruction and degradation by bloody and terrible means.

Sir, I say to you that if, in the face of every prompting of self-interest and self-protection, and humanity and gratitude, and Christianity and statesmanship, we abandon these poor wretches to their fate, the wrath of an offended God cannot fail to fall upon the nation.

There never was in the history of the world an instance wherein right and wrong met so squarely face to face and looked each other so squarely in the eyes as in this matter. Never did truth array herself in such shining and glorious habiliments; never did the dark face of error look so hideous and forbidding as in this hour. And yet in the minds of some we find hesitation and doubt.

I cannot but recur to a famous parallel in history.

On the 22d of January, 1689, the English Parliament assembled to decide upon the most momentous question ever submitted to that body. The king, James II, had fled the realm; the great seal of royalty had been thrown into the Thames; William had landed; the nation was revolutionized.

The great debate commenced. On the one side was the party of human liberty striving to cast down forever a dynasty strangely devoted to tyranny and absolutism; striving to make plainer the doctrine that the king reigned by virtue of the consent of his subjects. On the other hand were arrayed all the evil forces of the time and all the restraints of conservatism.

In precisely the same temper in which it is now argued that a State can do no wrong, and that under no circumstances can it cease to be a State, it was then argued that, although the king had fled the land and was at the court of France, nevertheless the magistrate was still present, that the throne, by the maxim of English law, could not be vacant for a moment; and that any Government organized to act during the king's absence must act in the king's name.

It was most plain that the liberty, the prosperity of England could only be secured by the deposition of James; and yet those who sought by direct measures to reach that end were encountered at every step by a mass of technical objections. The musty precedents of the law, a thousand years old, were raked up; and texts of the Holy Book were called into the defense of royalty as liberally as we have seen them in our own day paraded in defense of slavery. St. Paul's injunction to the Romans to obey the civil power, played as important a part in those debates as the texts of Ham and Onesimus have played upon the floor of this House.

Either the liberty of England must have perished, encumbered in this mass of precedents and technicalities, or the common sense of England must reach its own safety over the whole mass of rubbish. The common sense of England triumphed. James having fled he was declared to have abdicated the throne, and the throne being vacant Parliament asserted the right to fill it.

Now, in like manner at this day the resolute common sense of the American people must find its way out of the entanglements that surround it and go straight forward to its own safety.

The purpose of government is the happiness of the people, therefore of the whole people. A Government cannot be half a republic and half a despotism—a republic just and equitable to one class of its citizens, a despotism cruel and destructive to another class; it must become either all despotism or all republic.

If you make it all republic the future is plain. All evils will correct themselves. Temporary disorders will subside; the path will lie wide open before every man; and every step and every hour will take him farther away from error and darkness. Give the right to vote and you give the right to aid in making the laws; the laws being made by all will be for the benefit of all; the improvement and advancement of each member of the community will be the improvement and advancement of the whole community.

Dealing with men, with all the attributes of men, with the souls, hearts, and minds of men, it is contemptible to attempt to turn justice aside by appeals to the color of the skin. At what precise point of the mingling of complexions shall these statesmen drive the stake and say, Thus far is man and beyond is brute; here human rights begin and there they terminate! What chemist shall analyze the mixture of man and beast, and tell us what fraction of an immortal soul is possessed by such a one? Or how many mulattoes go as component parts to make up one soul in heaven?

Sir, such a doctrine is too monstrous for consideration! The earth is God's, and all the children of God have an equal right upon its surface; and human legislation which would seek to subvert this truth merely legislates injustice into law; and he who believes that injustice conserves the peace, order, or welfare of society has read history to little purpose.

Let us then go straight forward to our duty, taking heed of nothing but the right. In this wise shall we build a work in accord with the will of Him who is daily fashioning the world to a higher destiny; a work resting at no point upon wrong or injustice, but everywhere reposing upon truth and justice; a work which all mankind will be interested in preserving in every age, since it will insure the increasing glory and well-being of mankind through all ages.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Mr. Speaker, it is of little avail, idle perhaps, to attempt any resistance of a caucus measure of the majority of this House. But it is hard, sad to stand silently by and see the Republic overthrown. It is indeed appalling to those accustomed from early childhood to revere and love the Constitution, to feel that it is in the keeping of those having the power and determination to destroy it. Good men, patriots, have hoped that the mad passions of the war would ere two years have passed been succeeded by the spirit and temper that characterized those who originally formed the Union. But how great and sad their disappointment must be seen in the destructive and revengeful measures now pending in this House. With the passage of this bill must die every hope and vestige of the government of the Constitution. Never was there a measure or movement fraught with such fearful and fatal consequences to the Republic. It is indeed the final breaking up and dissolution of the Union of the States by the usurpation and revolutionary act of Congress. If the bill itself does not on its face and in express words recite the fact the speech of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. STEVENS,] who introduced and has the management of it, plainly declares that it is revolutionary in spirit and purpose. No rebel to this Government, north or south, ever called with more bitter hate, scorn, and contempt for the forces of revolution to unite and rally to overthrow it. No leader ever had more supple and willing followers, none was ever more complete master of the situation. His word is law, his call will be obeyed. Hear him as reported in the Globe:

"May I ask, without offense, will Congress have the courage to do its duty? Or will it be deterred by the clamor of ignorance, bigotry, and despotism from perfecting a revolution begun without their consent, but which ought not to be ended without their full participation and concurrence? Possibly the people would not have inaugurated this revolution to correct the palpable incongruities and despotic provisions of the Constitution; but having it forced upon them, will they be so unwise as to suffer it to subside without erecting this nation into a perfect Republic?"

He need not have asked, "Will Congress have the courage?" The majority will surely follow their bold and daring leader even into revolution:

"Will it be deterred by the clamor of ignorance, bigotry, and despotism from perfecting a revolution begun without their consent, but which ought not to be ended without their full participation and concurrence?"

What revolution? Begun by whom? Without whose consent? To be concurred in by the majority of a constitutional Congress? Or is the revolution referred to the one begun by secessionists, carried on by rebels to the Constitution and the Union for the purpose of dividing it, and to prevent which all the people of all the land were made mourners and future generations burdened with untold millions of debt? And this is the revolution in which, by this monstrous bill, the gentleman calls upon his friends and his party to fully participate and concur. Revolution it is—revolution to break up and divide the Union. Precisely what secession and rebellion, but for the valor of the Army of the Union, would have accomplished.

"Possibly the people would not have inaugurated this revolution to correct the palpable incongruities and despotic provisions of the Constitution."

What people? Not the southern secessionists certainly, because there was no doubt, no possibility of mistaking their position. They are willing now the revolution should "subside," they are willing to submit to the Constitution as it is and with all its "incongruities;" they are willing the Republic should stand. They have given up the revolution, and the gentleman and his party followers, by this bill, have taken it up and propose that it shall not subside till the "palpable incongruities" of the Constitution are removed.

It is then clearly admitted by the gentleman that the purpose of this bill is to correct or remove certain supposed "incongruities" in the Constitution by adopting and carrying forward the revolution inaugurated by secessionists, culminating in most bloody war, and which he says "possibly" without their beginning might not have been begun.

There can be no mistaking the object of this bill as declared by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. It is to avoid or get rid of the Constitution or some provision of it. Its revolutionary purpose is as clear as the sun-light. He says, in the same speech, advocating this bill, (and be it remembered that speech was no extemporaneous one, but carefully prepared, written, and reserved several days after delivery for revision.)

"Think not I would slander my native land; I would reform it. Twenty years ago I denounced it as a despotism. Then twenty million white men enchained four million black men. I pronounce it no nearer to a true Republic now when twenty-five million of a privileged class exclude five million from all participation in the rights of government."

Twenty years ago he "denounced" his "native land as a despotism," and he "pronounces it no nearer to a true Republic now." There were traitorous bad men in 1860 and 1861 who did the same thing, who as honestly believed as he did that it was a "despotism." Their convictions carried them into rebellion. The gentleman by this bill proposes not to let that rebellion and revolution end without "full participation and concurrence." If traitors instigated that revolution I need not characterize those who fully "participate and concur in it."

Sir, immediate passage of this bill is urged by the gentleman because of the late decision of the Supreme Court in the case of Milligan. That decision he denounces as "infamous," "dangerous to the lives and liberties of the loyal men of the country." What is there in this decision that calls for revolutionary measures? In what way is this bill to interfere with or effect it? What is there in it to call for malediction and denunciation? The gentleman does not complain that it does not truly declare the law. Is the court itself to be stricken down; to be revolutionized? Are the provisions of the bill as sweeping and extensive as that?

Sir, none but despots and violators of law hate or fear that court or its decisions. None but those who would donounce and condemn their native land denounce it. It brought the glad tidings to the depressed and despairing people of this country that the Constitution has not yet been destroyed, that it yet stands the bond of our union, the fundamental law of the land. For one I thank God for that decision in this dark hour of our country. It may save us from just such usurpation as this Congress, by this bill, would inflict upon us. It is the only hope of liberty in this land to-day. That decision has crowned the court with immortal glory. Time, the clamor of disappointed demagogues, nor the malignant howl of crazy fanatics can ever dim the luster it has shed upon American jurisprudence. Future generations in all coming time will honor and revere that court as the great conservator of constitutional liberty and law. It rose above the surging, remorseless passion of rebellion and civil war into the calm judicial atmosphere of reason and truth, and gladdened the hearts of the millions who never "denounced their native land" by declaring the law as it is:

"The Constitution of the United States is law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great emergencies of the Government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy and despotism."

Where is there an honest lawyer who doubts that as law? What is there to denounce in it? What is there infamous in that opinion? Sir, these denunciations are because that court does not adopt revolution as a precedent, because it does not follow the lead of the gentleman by "full participation and concurrence" in the rebellion to revolutionize this Government.

But the passage of this bill is a necessity also, according to the gentleman's construction of it, because the presidential office is in his way. It is not only to deprive the Supreme Court in some manner of its lawful jurisdiction, but the Executive of the nation, "the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy," is to be made to bow in meek submission and obey the behest of the gentleman and his party in Congress. Listen, again, to his speech in support of this bill:

"Though the President is Commander-in-Chief, Congress is his commander; and, God willing, he shall obey. He and his minions shall learn that this is not a Government of kings and satraps, but a Government of the people, and that Congress is the people."

The President refuses to go with the gentleman and his followers into a "full participation and concurrence" in the revolution inaugurated by the rebellion, and this measure is to reduce him to obedience; to bring him into accord with the will of the majority of this Congress; to simplify the Government by striking down or usurping the powers of the coordinate departments.

There seems to be, then, three leading objects in this measure to be carried into practical effect by a full "participation and concurrence" in "the revolution:" to get rid of the Supreme Court or its decision; to depose the President or compel him to "obey" the majority of Congress; and thereby, or as an additional object, correct "palpable incongruities and despotic provisions of the Constitution," and turn ten of the sovereign States of the Union into Territories, or hold them without governments as conquered provinces. These are some of the avowed, bold, wicked, revolutionary purposes of this scheme. No wonder at the implied doubt of the gentleman: "Will Congress have the courage" to come down to the requirement? No wonder he finds it necessary to storm, bluster, threaten, and scold his weak-kneed followers. But they will all come in to the support of this or some like measure. They will tremble, turn pale, and curse a little, but his cunningly-insinuated punishment in the question he put, "Do you believe in hell?" will bring every mother's son of them, unless possibly the gentleman from New York, [Mr. RAYMOND,] of whom nothing quite certain is known till after he has made his speech and recorded his vote.

More, doubtless, was meant by this statesman-like inquiry. There may have been a more solemn significance. The tendency of his party in that direction admonishes all its members not to deny the Divinity, in the presence of which they are soon to appear. Sir, this seems almost like trifling with a grave subject, and yet the devout earnestness with which that inquiry was propounded by the venerable gentleman cannot fail to impress this House with the thought that there is some very close and intimate connection between this measure and that gloomy abode upon which he would have his followers fix their faith and belief.

I listened to and have examined the gentleman's speech in connection with this bill to find, if possible, some argument, some suggestion of constitutional authority or warrant for the measure; but there is none—absolutely none. Ten of the pillars on which this Union rests, and some of those upon which and by the power of which it was originally erected, are to be torn from under it and prostrated to the earth by unauthorized and arbitrary power, by some means or power unknown to our law. The principles upon which it is to be done are all false, both in theory and fact, and as destructive of the Union as the States. The preamble, which has been stricken out since the bill was reported and since the gentleman made his speech, recites that the "confederate States," so called, "have forfeited all their rights under the Constitution." And in his speech he declares:

"The Federal arms triumphed. The confederate armies and governments surrendered unconditionally. The law of nations then fixed their condition. They were subject to the controlling power of the conquerors. No former laws, no former compacts or treaties existed to bind the belligerents. They had all been melted and consumed in the fierce fires of the terrible war."

Now, sir, I deny every assertion here made, except only that "the Federal arms triumphed." And that of itself, in view of the purpose of the contending parties, is a complete refutation of all the other allegations and conclusions. The States and their governments were not destroyed. All the attempts to take them out of their relations to the other States of the Union were failures, and every step in that direction was an illegal and void act. And the moment the rebellion was put down and the people freed from its control they, the people of the State, had the right to their State government as before the war.

On the part of the confederates the struggle was to separate and divide; on our part to prevent separation and division and preserve the States in the Union. They sought to avoid the laws of the Federal Government: we to enforce them. They denied their obligations to obey the Constitution: we insisted upon their obedience. They declared they would no longer live with us as States in the Union: we demanded they should remain forever. They claimed the right to secede when they felt disposed: we avowed secession a monstrous heresy, and that the Union was formed in perpetuity. They left the Halls of Congress and declared they would no longer perform their duties and functions in the Union: we swore on the altar of our country that they should obey the Constitution and laws made in pursuance thereof. They seized their arms and appealed to the God of battles for the justice of their cause: we accepted the wager of battle, and lifted our eyes in prayer to Heaven that the issue might be with us. We pressed them closely and more closely, and in their agony and desperation they cried for the purpose of rallying their dispirited forces, we meant to "subjugate" them. And as victory wavered in the balance we solemnly, before God and the civilized age, declared, "That, banishing all feeling of mere passion or resentment," we "will recollect only" our "duty to the whole country; that this war is not waged upon our part in any spirit of oppression, nor for any purpose of conquest or subjugation," "but to defend and maintain the supremacy of the Constitution and to preserve the Union, with all the dignity, equality, and rights of the several States unimpaired: that as soon as these objects are accomplished the war ought to cease."

"The Federal arms triumphed," and if the triumph is complete, determined all the issues in their favor. "The confederate armies and government were overthrown and surrendered"—not "unconditionally," but upon these conditions, held out to them and never withdrawn till the end of the war. The law of nations holds such promises as binding. Vattel, page 439, says: "All promises made to an enemy in the course of war are obligatory." Neither are treaties made void by war which were "stipulated in case of rupture." This is the case where the war is between two nations. I utterly deny the abominable and detestable doctrine of the gentleman as the law of nations, that the conquered nation is subject to the absolute will and disposal of the conqueror. What he may or may not do depends in some measure on the cause of the difficulty and who were actually engaged in it. His rights spring from the sources of natural justice, and should be exercised and measured by justice and humanity. The doctrine that the conquered nation may be disposed of at the sovereign will and pleasure of the conqueror is opposed to the humane and enlightened sense of the age. It is the source and fountain of despotism and despotic power. It is not the law of nations. Vattel, page 454, writing upon this subject, says:

"But if the whole nation be subdued, in what manner can the victor treat it without transgressing the bounds of justice? What are his rights over the conquest? Some have dared to advance this monstrous principle that the conqueror is absolute master of his conquest, that he may dispose of it as his property, treat it as he pleases, according to the common expression of treating a State as conquered country; and hence they derive one of the sources of despotic government. But enough of those who would reduce men to the state of transferable goods, or use them like beasts of burden, who would deliver them up as the property or patrimony of another man. Let us argue on principles countenanced by reason and becoming humanity."

But I deny that the law of nations fixed the condition of the so-called confederate States, or in any manner determined their status. The law of nations or the common laws of war, those maxims of humanity adopted by common consent for the more humane conduct of war, undoubtedly applied in its prosecution in the conduct of the war itself. But ours is a nation, with a government of its own, with a written Constitution and laws providing for peace and war, "with stipulations in case of rupture," which the "fierce fires of war" have not consumed. That Constitution has not been superseded by the law of nations, but it stood at the end of the war, and still stands, vindicated and sustained, the supreme law of the land "in war and in peace." For those innocent of its violation it provides protection and immunity, and for the guilty speedy, fair trials and just punishment. It superseded and annulled all rules, canons, treaties, compacts, laws, and constitutions not in harmony in letter and spirit with its provisions. And in the language of the Supreme Court, before quoted—

"The Constitution of the United States is law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances."

This is the voice of authority and settles the question finally and fully as to what laws are to be executed and control in the government of the people of the United States. Away, then, with all those who "denounce their native land;" who would substitute the uncertain, doubtful, and undefined laws of war and of nations for our matchless written Constitution; who would apply the musty code of the monarchs and kings of the dark ages to the citizens of the Republic and subject them to the forfeitures and penalties of the rules and laws of barbarism; who, contemning and denouncing the organic law of the Union, with bloody and malignant hearts would subjugate, confiscate, banish, burn, kill, and destroy others for resisting a Government which they themselves denounce as a despotism; who professing to be the especial champions of liberty would destroy the only charter by which it is secured to the people.

But it is insisted by the gentleman in his speech and in the preamble to this bill that the warrant for this measure is to be found in the fact that the States called the "confederate States of America" have "forfeited all their rights under the Constitution."

On the 25th of January, 1866, in a speech delivered in this House, and published in the Globe of that date, I argued more fully than I can now the question of forfeiture and many of the others involved in this measure: I now affirm all I then said. The positions taken are, in my judgment, unanswered and unanswerable. I assert now as I did then, this Government is one created under and by a written Constitution emanating from the people through the States acting in their highest sovereign capacity. It has no powers sovereign or otherwise except such as are granted to it in and by that instrument. All powers not granted are expressly reserved to the States or the people thereof. The original purpose of the States in forming the Union under the Federal Constitution was the better to protect and preserve each other and the rights and liberties of their several communities from violence, both from within and from without. The jurisdiction granted to it over the States was to govern and control them as States and people of States in the Union. It was the creature of the States, deriving its life from them, and without any power to live except in the life of the States. It is a grand and majestic structure; its beautiful proportions towering high up among the proudest nations of the earth, uplifted, upheld, and sustained only by preserving the States by and of which it was created. Its highest authority and most solemn duty, self-preservation, demands the preservation of the States. It has no power, express or implied, by which it can consent to "forfeiture" by a State of any of its rights under the Constitution. The obligation of a State to remain in the Union and exercise its functions and perform its duties as a State is not an obligation to the Federal Government alone, but to each and all the other States, and to every citizen of the United States. But if it were possible that a State of the Union could "forfeit" its rights as a State, what would become of those rights, where would they vest? Certainly not in the Federal Government, because under the Constitution from which it derives all its powers and jurisdiction it has not the power or authority either to hold or exercise any of the rights that properly appertain to the States as such.

It has no use for such powers and no lawful right to exercise them. Should it attempt to seize, hold, or exercise or accept, even as a forfeiture or otherwise, any rights or powers not granted in the charter by which it was created it would be nothing but usurpation. It must preserve the States and the governments of the States and the people of the States in order to preserve and enjoy the powers and rights conferred upon it by them. Any other position is destruction of the Union.

Sir, this Union is not yet destroyed. The Constitution still binds and holds the States together. Its provisions have not been "melted and consumed in the fierce fires of terrible war." It is only the fiercer fires of more terrible and successful war that can melt and consume the ligaments by which that instrument binds together the States of this Union. All other "laws, compacts, and treaties" may "melt" and be consumed, but while the Constitution remains, while its provisions stand, war may rage, secession surge, and fanatics howl in vain against the Union. It will stand till the Constitution itself is melted and destroyed.

There never was a more abominable doctrine or one more fatal to this Government than that which asserts its right and power to hold the late insurgent States as conquered territory and the people as conquered subjects. It is a virtual denial of the power of self-preservation, and a pregnant admission that the powers assumed and the rights asserted are not to be found in the Constitution. It is a most base and wicked subterfuge by which to usurp and exercise ungranted and despotic powers. It is a doctrine no less fatal to the Union than the States. If persisted in by those in possession of the Government, and acquiesced in by the people, it must end in the overthrow of the Republic and the establishment of an empire upon its ruins. It is at war with every principle of the Constitution and a complete swallowing up of the liberties of the people it was intended to secure. Hereafter our charters will be written grants of privileges from the Government to the people, instead of written grants of power by the people to the Government. This bill can be looked upon only as a bill granting privileges from the hand of arbitrary power to a pretended, wicked, and undeserving people who have forfeited all their rights under the Constitution. It is "a crumb from their master's table." It is a generous gift from this magnanimous Congress of so much of liberty and privilege to the people as it deems prudent and best. Is not this the plain, unvarnished theory of this measure and of the gentleman's speech? Ten of the States of this Union with ten million people of the United States have been conquered, and in virtue of its conquest the Federal Government is invested with all the rights and liberties of these States and people, holding them as a conqueror to be reluctantly doled out according to its supreme will and pleasure by this charter of privileges. I say reluctantly, for even this has been delayed for almost two years. Have not the centuries been rolling backward? Can we not almost see the people demanding of Congress Magna Charta?

Sir, the doctrine that this Government can make conquest of any of the States of this Union is opposed to, is at war with the fundamental idea of the Government itself. It would destroy the harmony of the system of States and Union by allowing of antagonist interests. It would offer to the General Government the allurements of power and aggrandizement not in the interest and growth of the States and Union, but in its own separate interest. It would nullify all the provisions of the Constitution reserving powers to the States and the people. It would be equivalent to a bribe to the Government to destroy the States and the liberties of the people by the exercise of despotic powers. But it is absurdly impossible that the United States Government, except by usurpation, should make "conquest" of one of the States of which it is composed. It has certain prescribed limited powers and jurisdiction with the means and capabilities of using and exercising them, but no use for, no capacity to hold, or means of exercising any others. It had before the war, by the authority of the organic act of its creation, the power and jurisdiction, certain, defined, and limited, to control, govern, and preserve the States as States in the Union. Its jurisdiction is the same now the war is over; no greater, no less.

There is, there can be no such thing as this Government being able to increase or enlarge its powers or jurisdiction over the States by "conquest." It can derive powers but in one way and that by constitutional grant. No act of any or all the parties to the Constitution can take from or add to those granted thereby in any other way than by amendment according to the provisions of the Constitution itself. Under the Constitution as it is, the power is granted to the General Government to suppress insurrection, repel invasions, and, upon application, protect the States from domestic violence. It is absurd that in successfully performing this duty it could by any possibility destroy the State, or permit the State or the insurrection or all together to destroy the State as such in the Union. And yet to such absurdities does the doctrine on which this bill is founded lead. Let insurrection arise in any State of the Union and the Government undertake to suppress it; if it shall assume proportions large enough to entitle the insurgents according to the laws of war to belligerent rights, the nation becomes divided into two parties and the party that shall finally submit has forfeited all rights under the Constitution and is subject to the will of the other as a conqueror under the law of nations.

If the Federal Government should be called on to protect the State from domestic violence and the disturbing party should be able in any manner to possess itself of the State, so as to deprive the inhabitants for the time being of all civil government, and should magnify its powers and increase its numbers so that under the human laws of modern warfare, the laws that govern public war, should be recognized as applicable to its conduct, such a State and all the inhabitants thereof, when finally the Government should conquer, will have lost all their rights except only such as may be found in the law of nations as applicable when one nation conquers another.

The bare statement of such a proposition shows it to be preposterous. The Constitution is the paramount and ever-continuing law, both in war and in peace. The Army can only be used in aid of its enforcement. It is clear that no warrant for this measure can be found in the Constitution. The gentleman certainly has not claimed it. No one believing in the truth of the preamble of this bill will claim any constitutional power for it under that section: "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government." The bill goes upon the theory that they are not now States in the Union; indeed, that they are not States at all. The gentleman from Pennsylvania styles them States never "restored from a state of conquest," "outlawed States," and says:

"Congress denies that any State lately in rebellion has any government or constitution known to the Constitution of the United States, or which can be recognized as a part of the Union."

If, then, these are not States, or if not "States in this Union," that provision of the Constitution has no reference to them. It refers in express terms to States "in" the Union only. The Government has no such power, and is under no such obligation to any other States. There is then no law, no constitutional power for this measure, and no rightful power for holding these States in a state of "conquest." The war long since finished its bloody, its devastating work of suppressing the insurrection and putting down the rebellion. All have submitted, combatants and people, and admit that the Constitution is the supreme law of the land in all emergencies for rulers and people. To hold these States as the gentleman says they are held, as "outlawed" States in a "state of conquest," is the usurpation and exercise of despotic and tyrannical power in its most odious form, and will assuredly end in the destruction of all constitutional government.

Sir, a fearful responsibility rests upon those who would continue this state of things. Let us not flatter ourselves that this appetite for dismantling and devouring States and converting them into Territories will be satiated with the ten States now claimed by conquest; the more it devours the more it will demand. Already it has been declared by the leader of the majority here that the constitutions of Maryland and Kentucky, and even his own State of Pennsylvania, States as patriotic as any in the Union, ought to be reformed and made to accord with the congressional idea of republican government. A few months more of rapid progress and advancement like that of the last two years, and Congress will provide constitutions for all the States in accordance with its view of the spirit of the age and of republican government. Congress by its usurpations and assumption of powers and its growing hostility to the other coordinate departments of the Government is rapidly becoming the most fearful despotism that ever menaced liberty in this country. Through its acknowledged leader it scandalously denounces the decision of the highest tribunal as "infamous;" calls God to witness that the Chief Magistrate of the nation shall obey Congress, and with most audacious effrontery falsely declares "Congress is the people." With the provision now being made by it for perpetual session there seems to be but one step more, and that is to declare the office for life, with the right, by will, to name a successor.

No candid man can deny that this measure is revolutionary. That we are in a state of revolution seems to be admitted by the advocates of this bill—a revolution by whomsoever "concurrent" in is now adopted and carried on by the majority of this Congress. It is a revolution more dangerous to the Republic, more hostile to its underlying its essential principles, than that which was prosecuted by armed rebellion. That was for separation, for a separate republic. The government it was to establish was founded on a written constitution with provisions challenging the respect of the most liberal and enlightened minds, and which, had it not been for its provision for slavery, would have been no reproach to any age or to any people. The revolution of today is against our written Constitution, and if successful will convert the Union into a despotism. Think not this can be done in peace or without the shedding of blood. It is not well to forget the fearful throes of the nation when secession would have rent the Constitution asunder and severed the Union. Peaceable consolidation is as impossible as peaceable secession. "Let us alone," will no more avail in the one case than the other. The people will not relish empire more than a dismembered Union. All history is not a lie. Human hearts and human passions are not all unlike what they have been in the past. The order of our Government cannot be reversed without a desperate struggle. The people will not long brook to crawl at the feet of despotic power, or beg their rights and liberties from the hands of one or two hundred despots. The people know the source of sovereignty is the people. "Congress is" not "the people." The people acting through the States created the United States, to protect, defend, and preserve, not to destroy, the States. Twenty-six States are not the United States.

The charter of the people's liberties did not come down from Congress. All the sovereign powers of Congress are named in the people's charter to Congress. In that charter is all your warrant. Go beyond it and you invade liberty. When liberty is invaded all but slaves and despots resent, and sooner or later will resist the invasion. It is the common cause of all who are worthy to be free. It is the cause of the people against power. In such a conflict liberty and justice will be not only vindicated, but their wrongs will be redressed and the malefactors punished. Retribution may be slow, but it will come with unerring certainty, measured by the hand of divine justice.

Mr. Speaker, I hope, I devoutly pray these troublous times may have an end without further sacrifice of fraternal blood; that our constitutional rights and liberties may not be lost in this fanatical revolution. Let sectional hatred and all revenge be buried in oblivion. Reconciliation is the only restoration. This Congress has never avowed any "policy" for either. The gentleman admits if we ask even now "what is the policy of Congress, the answer is not always at hand." It is time that answer were ready; it is time all were satisfied and assured. Delay awakens doubt and distrust and begets danger. If those who pant for more blood could reflect, they too would discard further sanguinary measures. Malignant passion has counseled long enough; let it slumber. Is it not enough to enslave ten million people; hold them in a "state of conquest for two years?" Congress has opportunity such as no other body of men ever had, such as I fear it may never have again, by a word to speak peace, reconciliation, amity to a suffering and unhappy country. A brave and unarmed people lie conquered at your feet, bowed in spirit and oppressed with many sorrows. They have surrendered all for which they contended on the battle-field and more than you demanded before they gave to you their arms. Let not the pride of victory, passion, or revenge make you unjust and change your victory into defeat.

Generosity never lost the conqueror anything; cruel and unwise exactions have renewed many an arm and renewed many a struggle. Better than that subjugation and oppression should continue follow the example of the monster Duke of Alva; take twenty thousand to the block and be satisfied. Two hundred thousand may not satisfy the people for wrong and injustice long continued.

During Mr. ELDRIDGE's remarks the hour of half past four having nearly arrived, on motion of Mr. LE BLOND, by unanimous consent the session was extended till a quarter to five o'clock, at which time, pursuant to order, the House took a recess till seven and a half o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at seven and a half o'clock p. m., (Mr. ECKLEY in the chair.)

Mr. WARNER. At the opening of this Congress we were confronted by a most extraordinary and dangerous condition of national affairs. The war which had crowded into the space of four years the events, transmutations, changes, and progress of ordinary centuries, had spent its force; the passions and purposes and energies of the nation were no longer entirely absorbed in the marshaling of armies and in their deadly conflicts. On one hand the insurgents had sullenly withdrawn from that arena discomfited, having renounced none of their iniquities or crimes, or abandoned any of their errors, prejudices, or ultimate purposes to control the Government. On the other hand, the loyal nation, swayed by all the delirium of success, surveyed the scene of their untold sacrifices and conflicts, stirred to no purposes of vengeance, moved to no act of retribution, impelled to no excess of action, and seemingly scarcely susceptible of any emotion or virtue but charity, or of being awakened to any consciousness or belief but that of the absolute safety of our then more than ever imperiled country.

The conflict of arms had shocked the world, had wrung an unparalleled tribute of torture from humanity, and scarred the face of the continent. But the rebellion had not spent its force in brute concussion alone. It had changed the whole course of our civilization; it had settled forever many doubtful and long-debated questions of constitutional right and governmental policy; it had crystalized all political elements and forces, and arrayed them either for or against the national unity and national life. But beyond this it had a still higher significance. A rebellion of political elements, of ideas, and an antagonistic system of government, it had marshaled all their constituent elements and forces; it had marshaled a nation extemporized; it had States with all their high, sacred trusts and guardianships, and peoples with all their fortunes, hopes, and civilization, and in that death struggle for the mastery of the nation, with all the terrible energy of despair, had cast them into the scale, and lost, for they were the hazard of the die.

Discuss it as we may, torture the actual facts and condition as we will, refine and sublimate this matter as we please, this Congress was called to contemplate and provide for this state of facts. Ten insurgent communities, comprising ten million people, lawfully under the disability of unsuccessful treason and war, conquered by no other force than arms, held to our dominion then, and now, by that force alone, and who, by the laws of war and of conquest, speaking in their adjudications as the highest arbiter of Christendom and above all other laws and constitutional formula, had forfeited all civil rights and all civil government.

We were called to contemplate and act upon these admitted facts. Six million people, lawful belligerents, owing to our sovereignty allegiance, having no rights toward their former State governments, and outlaws under the national Government; a people in fact launched by their act of unsuccessful treason into the shoreless sea of anarchy, having neither a government nor the right of government, but, nevertheless, subjects of government; having neither laws nor the right to laws, property, nor the right of property, nor any other right, but holding all, even life itself, upon the tenure of the arbitrary will of the conqueror!

We were called to contemplate and provide for four million people, who by the act of the nation as the price of its life had received the highest benison of all human governments, the right to liberty and American citizenship. It became our duty as far as possible to lift the load of woe which the degradation of two centuries of oppression and slavery had not in vain heaped on the head of that devoted people; to eradicate as far as possible by all humane and congenial legislation those obstacles which otherwise would prevent their being incorporated into the body-politic, and which would inevitably hereafter render them not only a dangerous element to our political and national stability, but a financial problem the solution of which might involve the question of national financial disaster and ruin.

These were presentments which well might confound our philanthropy and tax the utmost resources of our highest order of statesmanship. But this was not all. The national Executive had proclaimed the fact of the entire extinction of all State government in the insurgent States. He had ignored every constitutional function which they could perform; and arrested, imprisoned, or driven into exile every functionary who dared to assume or exercise a right or function under those governments. He had proclaimed and issued his edicts to that effect, that new State governments should be created in the place of those subverted, through the medium of the loyal people alone; and made the determination of that loyalty to depend upon unjust, unwise, and arbitrary rules, with no appeal to any other department of the Government, but prescribed and enforced to suit the caprices of his passions and prejudices and more than imperial will. He had placed the iron heel of State and national disfranchisement upon the entire people, and suffered their communities and States to commence their existence alone through his license and the medium of his amnesty and pardon.

He had compelled these communities and States thus organized to submit to the behests of their military governors and dictators, appointees and creatures of his; and through them molded their several constitutions and internal policies, not in conformity to the desires or political sentiments of their people, but in conformity to his own; and these bastard State governments, having no legitimate origin either in the people of those States or as an emanation of the State or national governments, but wrung from a conquered and violated people as the price of their submission to his policy, having representatives subservient to his purposes, he presented to this Congress with an audacity shocked at no inconsistency; proclaiming the entire work of reconstruction and restoration of these States an accomplished fact, and denying that any other department of the Government had the prerogative, power, or right to question the effect of such action on the nation, or to call in question either his power or purposes in the premises.

Thus had been stricken from existence the whole fabric of southern society. Their State and municipal governments, State and municipal institutions, had as a fact all been subverted; and the champion of State immutability and State inviolability would do well to square his logic in the light of this incontestable and inexorable fact. The insurgent State governments upon which the revolution opened, and in fact those upon which it closed, were then as now presented to us as defunct and dead, as inoperative and in-existent as are the ancient Governments of Thebes, Palmyra, or Greece to-day. And this stupendous fact was but resultant from another fact, admitted and acted upon by every department of the Government, the moral and political incapacity of the people of those States at that time to be expounded by a State government having any constitutional relation to or rights as against the national Government, for all connection with that Government had been severed, excepting alone the indissoluble bond of national citizenship and consequent allegiance.

Under such embarrassments and circumstances we were called to address ourselves to the duties imposed upon us by our position. The permanent peace of the country, the public safety, the reestablishment of our national authority, the material and permanent welfare of the insurgent communities, and all the inducements to the sway of law, order, civilization, and human progress demanding our immediate attention. Never were such responsibilities imposed upon a deliberative body, and never was there such an occasion for the exercise of pure, patriotic, and enlightened statesmanship. But for this action of the Executive, then was the first opportunity since the organization of the Government, when the bright dreams and high purposes of its founders, the absolute security of the blessings of liberty to us and our posterity, could possibly have been realized; and a failure of any department of the Government at that juncture to cooperate in the attempt to secure that result to the utmost possible extent was a crime which cannot fail to invoke the severest condemnation of impartial history.

But, sir, it is evident that this action of the Executive was deliberately intended to thwart, pervert, and prevent anticipated action of this Congress; to shorten the arm of its humanity, and weaken the sanctions of all possible requirements it might make of the insurgents before the people. It is evident that thereby he intended to place himself at the head of antagonisms in the public sentiment of the people of the South, which had arrayed that people, with such a deadly purpose and effect, against the life of the nation. It is evident that he thereby intended to fan the fires of the spirit of the rebellion until he had warmed into life a political organization with which, with himself at the head, he might hereafter successfully contend for the control of the Government. And this step was not hastily taken; this action was not resolved upon without a deliberate calculation of the forces and energies by which his purposes were to be accomplished. What if the course proposed involved a betrayal of party pledges, denial of professed political confidence, and an abandonment of all pretense of consistency. He well calculated that the cohesive power of the spoils of public plunder would be sufficient to make party of thieves even; that sycophancy would still fawn and flatter, and political success be sufficient to obliterate every remembrance of political inconsistency. He supposed that he had the gage of the passions and prejudices of the popular mind, and was prepared to feed those passions and inflame its delusions. He had weighed in the scale of his own integrity the honor, integrity, and constancy of the nation, and coldly, yet vainly, calculated the amount of patronage and appliances required to bribe and prostitute them to his ends.

Thus bent upon his purposes, no concession by us, excepting those which surrendered our manhood, which abnegated the functions we hold, and left the country a prey to desperate political adventurers, could have averted the storm which subsequently burst on the country. The country will bear witness to the fact that for months this Congress sat under the imputation of almost imbecile weakness because we hesitated to accept the issue which the Executive so defiantly and tauntingly hurled in our teeth. We hesitated until the country almost commenced to doubt our fidelity to principle or our constancy to serve them. I am appealing now to facts within the consciousness of us all, how we hesitated and demurred for the manifestations of his pleasure with reference to every act we considered, no matter how necessary our immediate action or how vital to the country; how, day by day, we were startled by his inconstant and incoherent utterances, as with all the pomp of pontiff, he promulgated them for the public press or public ear, to awe the timid, to distract the weak, and poison the confiding heart of the people against us; how once and again, presuming upon his confidence and cooperation, even the presumption of confidence was repelled by vetoes couched in the lowest appeals to the vulgar prejudices of the country against us; and how unwilling still to let him go we palliated his short-comings and excused his follies until the appearance of longer reposing confidence on our part was criminal, for the fact of his apostasy and betrayal had been roweled into the previously confiding heart of the country.

But, sir, when we sit in the shadows of this rebellion, the greatest conflict of centuries; when we contemplate its scope, its aims, its purposes and origin, its cruel exactions of human suffering, its drafts upon the energies of this generation, and the relentless mortgage it has imposed upon the right hand of its posterity, and its necessary effect upon our future governmental policy; and contemplate also the fact that the issues it precipitates into the politics of the nation are the land-marks of national progress, are the scales upon which we are given to read the elevations and depressions of humanity; when we contemplate that these issues were for the ultimate decision of the heart and brain of the nation, this action of the Executive, in thus arrogating to himself the sole prerogative of their adjustment or settlement, assumes a hideous magnitude of error, not to say criminality. Contemplated in its moral aspects it has all the profanity of a taunt against the purposes of the Almighty. It is the interposition of a man's hand against the light of Heaven, or His will, to check the irresistible motion of the spheres.

But, contemplated as political action, it had no legitimate object and was an unwarrantable provocation to the disturbance of the public mind. The people had become fully convinced that it was the prerogative of Congress to fix and settle the status of the insurgent States in the Union. It was a popular instinct of the people. It was their conviction, drawn from their knowledge of the precepts of the Constitution, from the teachings of history, and the overbearing demands of the public safety. Were the liberties of the people any less safe in the hands of Congress than in those of any other department of the Government? Does history present a single encroachment upon the liberties of the people by the popular branch of a representative Government? Was it even possible, under our theory of government, that such encroachments should come except through the executive department? The framers of the Constitution wisely anticipated the answer to these questions. The manner in which they interposed the checks and balances of that instrument, and the placing of the exercise of the powers of other departments of the Government under our ultimate control by providing for the impeachment of their officers, is an answer to any speculation on the subject; and the ominous retort of Sir Edward Coke to the arrogant message of Charles I to the House of Commons, at a time when they were considering the exercise of the king's prerogative and warning the Commons against such a course, "that it is the duty of this House to moderate the king's prerogative—nothing which reacheth to abuse that may not be treated here," may yet receive a far more significant utterance in our own history than when it was first chronicled in the history of English liberty.

But one word as to the pretenses and guise under which the rebellion, discomfited in arms, precipitates itself into this Congress to grasp the scepter of the power of the nation. Of course, Mr. Chairman, high constitutional sanctions are easily found. Subterfuges and false premises are easily invented. Why, they say that this rebellion, which in its political organization for four bloody years held almost undisputed sway over a quarter of the continent; which baffled the craft of our cabinets, and defeated, resisted, and held back almost the omnipotency of our arms, whose armies during all that time represented more material martial force and power than those of Frederick the Great, Alexander, or Cæsar; whose cruisers on the high seas drove from the protection of our flag eight hundred thousand tons of our shipping, sinking or burning as many more, more than the entire mercantile marine force of some of the first class Powers of Europe, or of any State of antiquity; and whose cruisers as lawful belligerents in the exercise of a legally accredited right anchored in the ports of every nation but one of the globe; that all this has no significance above that of individual action, nothing above a riot, and that too, as the Government is administered, not worthy the consideration of a grand jury one hour; that all this, as the Secretary of State dwarfs and belittles it, has no name or meaning above "our recent southern political disturbances," only a rude announcement of a political difference. They would have us believe that, having wrung from our Government and from the civilized world the concession of belligerents in war, they are not subject to all their incidents and penalties.

And we are told by the President and his partisans—indeed the President has made a formal announcement of the fact—"that the moment peace was declared the insurgent States became rehabilitated at once and instantly restored to all their former positions and rights in the Union." But this position concedes too much. In December, 1865, the President sent a special communication to this House in answer to a resolution as to "by what authority certain State criminals were held in confinement," in which communication he then declares that a state of war against the United States then existed in all these insurgent States. This, too, at a point of time months after these pretended State governments were organized, and they had elected Senators and Representatives to this Congress. Thus the rights of these pretended State governments and their representatives are condemned by the concessions of the logic and law of the Executive. But in all reason if war, not insurrection, can have no effect upon the integrity of the State governments, why should the fact of peace be required in the work of their restoration? What is the necessity of any policy of "restoration" or "reconstruction" where there has been neither forfeiture nor destruction. Such a position has all the illogical consequences of impossibility. This requirement of peace which the President considers as a condition precedent to restoration or reconstruction of these States has no basis in fact, and if conceded as necessary blasts his whole policy to the winds.

But, sir, one more step in the presidential logic of reconstruction is that these insurgent States have complied with all required conditions, and therefore good faith and right entitle them at once to admission to Congress. Now, this placing of a single condition or limitation upon the right of the insurgent States to assume their former condition or relation in the Union is a concession of the whole constitutional question; I care not whether that condition is loyalty or disloyalty, war or peace. If limitations or conditions exist by what power are they imposed? Are they imposed by the Constitution? Plainly not. They are imposed simply by the conqueror's might. They are imposed as a means of the public safety. Concede one limitation or condition and why not all others compatible with that safety? Then who is to determine their adjustment, and who when they are satisfied? If this right is suspended for a single moment where is the power vested to revive it? Who holds this discretion to exercise? I care not if you hold to a permanent or "temporary suspension" of the right of functions of these States; the question is still the same, where is the power of reanimation? If the power is falsely or improperly exercised has the nation any appeal, and if so, to whom? In what constitutional forum is the ultimate decision? The power rests where the Constitution puts it, in the United States; not in any department of that Government exclusively. Not in the Executive, for his power over the rebels was exhausted in the proclamation of amnesty and the signature of this pardon. That power was a simple suspension of the right of confiscation, extirpation, or to inflict the penalty of death. It related to certain functions of national as contra-distinguished from State citizenship.

But the disability of these States is not alone a disability as against the national Government, but on the contrary a primary and paramount disability is in the people of the State. The rebellion was not less a rebellion against the State than the national Government. The first fruits of the rebellion was the subversion of the State governments. This treason to the State governments affected the rights of State citizenship, and with the one fell the other. As treason against the General Government worked an incapacity of the citizen as against that Government, so treason against the State by the same rule works an incapacity in the citizen of the State. Now, both this destruction of the State government and its citizenship were facts primarily recognized by President Johnson in his scheme of reconstruction. Thus by proclamation he declares that his appointment of his provisional governors is "to present such a republican form of State government as will entitle the State to the guarantees of the Constitution." Were these States as States then entitled to the guarantees of the Constitution why then this action of the Executive?

Hence also, it is to restore State citizenship he deems it necessary to limit, define, fix, control, and confer the elective franchise on those who are to participate in the Government; that peculiar endowment and right of citizenship from which under our form of government the State is supposed to emanate, to which it owes its origin, and without which it could not exist one hour. But all know that the Executive has as much power to fix the qualification or limit the right of a voter for a member of the English House of Commons as for the meanest elective office in the State of North Carolina. And this is the weakness of those State governments. They are creatures of usurpation. They were so condemned by the best legal mind of the South, and they have been so condemned upon an appeal to the highest tribunal known to our policy, the bar of the intelligent judgment of the American people. And they will forever sit under that condemnation until it can be found that the whole theory of the Government has been perverted, and the national Executive can bestow State enfranchisement, can remove State disabilities, can restore the rights of State citizenship; in a word, until centralization shall have become the theory, and the whole functions and powers of the State and national Governments shall have been lost in the brain and power of the national Executive.

This necessarily anticipates the conclusion to which I come as to the legal condition of the insurgent States. I assume that until they are formally recognized and validated by Congress they have no constitutional relation to the General Government. I deny that the Executive has any authority to reorganize a State government or to initiate steps to that end; I insist that the attempt so to do is an act contrary to the theory of the Government, against its wisest provisions, and fraught with the greatest danger. As a practical question the concession of their validity is a repudiation of the whole results and benefits of the war; as a constitutional question such a precedent is pregnant with evils which cast their shadows of disaster down the whole course of our future history. For one I shall not enter upon such an experiment.

I voted for the constitutional amendments of the last session because I thought them declarations of sound, necessary, and as far as they went efficient constitutional requirements. It was my conviction at the time that our action in the premises ought to have been prefaced by a formal act or resolution of Congress declaring the action of the Executive touching the pretended organization of these States if not illegal, at least what he expressly declared it to be, "provisional or experimental" only, and "subject in its results to the approval of Congress." This action ought now to be taken at once. The sanction of time matures the greatest aggressions and wrongs into accreted rights. The President now pleads the fact that we did not declare him an usurper by the immediate overthrow of those State governments, as a justification for his usurpation and a vindication of his course. He tells us in his message that "Congress failed to provide any other plan of reconstruction." This is his admission of our power in the premises. If the power exists, the duty is imperative. With such a declaration emanating from this Congress, evincing its cool, settled, determined purpose in regard to these State organizations, you have taken the first and most efficient step in the solution of the problem of reconstruction.

My hour would not permit me at this time to discuss in detail all the requisite guarantees which I think the national safety demands of the insurgent States. The constitutional amendments submitted have already received the sanction of the people in a contest which has tried their honor, their integrity, and inflexible purpose more than any since the organization of the Government. That action is final; that decree is irrevocable. The people are too sensitive to their rights, too imperious in their high purposes, to be thwarted in the ultimate realization of the benefits they are calculated to bestow. Time has matured my conviction of their propriety. Events transpiring since their submission have convinced me of their necessity.

But the manner in which these proposed constitutional amendments have been received by the insurgent States has demonstrated the fact that they are superficial, and unattended by other requirements will rather prolong than eradicate the evils they were intended to correct. Prompted by and acting upon the unchecked and unrevoked authority of the Executive, they now repudiate our overtures and laugh our authority to scorn, and to-day the rebellion in its ostracism of all known friends of the Government, in its relentless proscription of all who have adhered to its fortunes, in its sentiment of caste, in its State and municipal legislation and administration, in its animus, in its purpose to dominate the Government, in its all, excepting the overt act of war, is as potent in the South as at the hour of Sumter or at any time during the war.

The war never had any political or moral justification other than as a means of bringing into control of those States those who were loyal to the Government and a proper administration of its laws. Each dollar spent, each drop of blood spilt, each maimed or fallen hero in that struggle, were so many pledges to the world that the hour of the nation's victory should be the hour of the realization of the fact. Without this consummation the war becomes a murderous mockery, a wretched failure. But up to this hour how has this promise been kept? Witness the thousand corpses of loyal blacks lining the by-ways and highways of those States, fendishly, wantonly, and even sportively murdered, and whose blood rests on the skirts of that whole people, because neither public sentiment nor law has even attempted to bring a single perpetrator of these outrages to justice. Ask of the loyal whites, and they point you to the hundreds thronging this Capitol demanding of us even the boon of protection. They point you to the thousands fleeing from their homes and exiles in the land they had sacrificed all to save. They point you to even the grave despoiled of its trust by solemn legislative action; to the ashes of the soldier of the Republic dug from the soil he had deemed by his death, to be consigned to the common receptacle of fiends and outlaws of society, that thereby they might dishonor the cause and insult the nation for which they died.

History presents not a parallel to that religious, patriotic devotion to a Government exhibited by those in the insurgent States who adhered to the Government during this struggle; a constancy attested by all the perils, yea, and the sacrifices of martyrdom; a constancy holding allegiance to the Government when its arm was too weak to reciprocate the duty of protection; a faith peering through every cloud of defect and gloom which for those terrible years seemed almost to stifle in our own breasts each illusion of hope. Heroic men standing amidst the wreck, chaos, and desolation of individual and national honor, of violated oaths and outraged laws, holding still their faith. Men who in that carnival of persecution and proscription, unchecked vengeance, with its untold ferocity, and all unmarked by any mitigatory feature, yielding none of their high purpose. These are virtues deserving to be canonized in the heart of the nation. Upon those virtues which no threats could awe, no perfidy barter, or bribery tempt, the unerring instincts of justice, the teachings of reason, the demands of peace and national safety, placed at once the reorganization of those States and the control of their destiny. The failure to do this was a crime which no words can palliate and no subterfuge excuse. The evils and disasters which this crime invoked you will find difficulty in the attempt to aggravate. There is not to-day an evil distracting our politics; there is no portentous cloud casting its impenetrable shadow into the future; there is not a murmuring discord of anarchy or an open threat of revolution grating upon the sensitive ear of the people which would or possibly could have been had this great crime been averted.

Sir, your work of restoration will never commence until the Congress of the United States assumes to be one of the departments of the General Government. It will never commence until it dare assert the fact that when the Constitution declares the United States shall guaranty to each State a republican form of government that there are other powers within the Constitution to be consulted than the Executive. It will never commence until you have declared, in the language of the Supreme Court, that the Executive, as Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, "cannot exercise a civil function." It will never commence until you have declared in the spirit of our institutions that the President in the exercise of the war power, in the creation or organization of these pretended State governments, has invaded the prerogative of this body, yea, the very prerogative of the people of those States, and set the most dangerous precedent in the whole of our constitutional history. It cannot be considered as commenced until you have laid these giant usurpations and wrongs at the feet of the loyal people of those communities for whose protection they were ostensibly created. And, sir, the work of restoration will have been accomplished when you declare, in the language of the Supreme Court, that this body has the sole power to determine which is the lawful government set up in these States; that if conditions are to be required we are the constitutional body to interpose those conditions, and that those conditions shall be loyalty to your Government, full protection to property and person of all within their borders, together with a full investment in all men alike of all endowments, franchises, and rights necessary to the most ample enjoyment of the blessings of liberty.

No more fearful experiment can be tried by the nation than the investment of one race or class of community with despotic legal arrogance and power, while at the same time you clothe another with nothing but the servility of trembling dependence. We have learned at too bitter cost the effect on the political morals of the nation of a lack in community of all reciprocal benefits and interests and legal obligations between race and race, man and man. We have tried that system which bred nothing but contempt on one hand and servile awe on the other, and the contemplation of which made Jefferson tremble for his country at the possibility of a God. We have tried a system of government which abrogated that sublime and divine attribute of law, and which through all time has not failed wherever found to challenge and secure all reasonable submission to its authority, and without which law cannot long have any sanction, the protection of helplessness, weakness, necessity, and dependence, and which gathers them into its sanctuary as the most sacred object of its highest interest and most anxious solicitude.

No nation but the most abject despotism can long survive a deprivation of any considerable class of its subjects from the full protection and benefits of its laws. Universal history attests this fact as one of the penalties of the exercise of exorbitant power. Moreover, he who has been accustomed, even to the smallest extent, to exercise an arbitrary and irresponsible control over the lowest of his fellow-creatures, to meet with no check either of power or popular opinion, "to feed a degrading pride by the habitual contemplation and contact of objects which the laws have abandoned" to his contempt and will, cannot fail to carry into all the walks of private life and public action a spirit at once noxious and dangerous to liberty. The lessons of this war were but to teach us the dangerous infection of degraded objects in the eyes of the law. Liberty, that divine summary of all good, like all its constituents and graces, happiness, virtue, and charity, in God's providence, must perish by hoarding and augment by diffusion; and we peril the peace of the nation, we dwarf its future greatness, we check its high career, if we exclude from its highest enjoyment any one within our borders whom God has thought worthy of humanity.

How is this view vindicated by the painful exhibitions we are daily called to witness? What other system than one similar to that to which I have just alluded could possibly have given to history those foulest blots upon its pages—those words, Pillow, Andersonville, and New Orleans? What other system could have produced such diabolisms as day by day crowd the public prints and the ear of this House with tales of horror, the very recital of which freezes the marrow to the bone, and drives the blood back curdled to its fountains? What other national Executive than one whose conscience was subverted by its influences, having power to prevent such crimes, could hand a defenseless race over to such torture and wink at such outrages, while he strikes hands with their tormentors, conspirators against the nation's life? What other Executive than one whose daily contact with such scenes had stifled the ordinary impulses of humanity would dare to palliate such crimes, and single-handed attempt to choke down the gushing protest of Christendom against them?

And how quickly come the practical results of even our premeditated abandonment of the black man, and our ostracism of him from the benefits of the Government. At once came the call for a permanent increase of your standing army to treble its number prior to the war. Let us look at this as statesmen. In the face of what necessity was this increase made more than the full expenses of the Government prior to the war? What was the exigency demanding it? The nations of the earth trembled at the thought of your power, and there was no possible contingency within the whole scope of conjecture which could possibly bring us into collision with them. Your Secretary of State had just declared the recently rebellious States perfectly restored to amicable relations to the General Government. Why must the nation be burdened with this expense? Why is the nation, which could not tolerate the humane and Christian expedient of the Freedman's Bureau, now to inflict upon the labor of the nation the incubus of a standing army? This demand, this recommendation, this action of the Government was only a substitution of force for humanity and justice. The pretended necessity involving it is conclusive against the policy producing it.

Why is it that by the advice of the Lieutenant General military occupancy is to be continued over the insurgent States, and why does the Executive talk of a possible war of races as a justification, at the expense of the nation, of this maintenance of the national police there? Let us remember that in all our late struggle this race, with the remembrance of centuries of degradation and slavery, with a present consciousness of the fearful fact that they were then the objects of a system of human wrong which lead their persecutors around the whole circle of human vices, and of which they were the victims; with every provocation, every motive, and every justification for revenge more than ever stirred the passions of any people; and yet no single outrage has ever been laid to their charge. What is this night-mare that seems to haunt the public quiet; what new crimes are these people the victims of; what right withheld; what threatened wrong depending that we can avert, that demands this new appliance of a standing army in our policy, more in its cost, more in its power than is required to keep a quarter of Asia at the foot of the British throne? I appeal to the conscience of the people to that of the nation and the world. The answer is here: it is the possibility of broken pledges of the nation of their equality before the law. It is the legitimate result of threatened crimes against them as a race, crimes organized under all the sanction and terrible ingenuity of pretended State laws, of unreasonable penalties for nominal crimes, of class legislation, of codes of blood against them and them only, which no nation can enact without peril, and which no people should enact without paying the forfeit of blood.

Let these insurgent State governments continue, let the African race be handed over to their tender mercies, let there be no interposition of the power of the nation in their behalf, and this programme will require, not only seventy thousand, but two hundred thousand soldiers to police these States. We have given them a measure of liberty, and as sure as the unerring logic of the human heart we will be obliged to follow it to its logical consequence. We have given them citizenship; you will be compelled to give them its necessary concomitant protection. If you give him protection, his equality in all respects before the law will assert itself. Force may postpone, but it cannot prevent. The equality of all men may come, as I trust God it will, peacefully, yet come it will inevitably if it costs the nation the reenactment of the bitterest experiences of centuries. With this, peace permanent and lasting will settle upon us; without this, as God rules and vindicates humanity there can be no peace. With this, we shall have a manly submission to all reasonable authority; without this your power will be but a provocation to future resistance, to future rejection of its sanctions, and, as it may be, revolution and anarchy.

Am I asked for the power to disturb these State governments and to require the terms which I have indicated of those communities before they are allowed the resumption of their former rights in the Union? I might reply that the right to make war implies the right to make peace; it implies the right to the exercise of all powers necessary to that end. Peace, just and permanent, is the right of war, it is the end and only object of war, and to accomplish that end the right of war is to strike down all laws, constitutions, or conventionalities of men that interpose.

But the President and these States have conceded our power in the premises; the one by express reservation and the other by the acceptance of the terms of such reservation. Upon the organization of these States the President placed in our hands and subject to our control the limitations and conditions upon which they were organized, and upon which their existence respectively depends. He and they have made these State governments subject to our will. Indeed, at the time that was an express condition of his policy. These States accepted that policy: have they any right to complain of its terms?

In his instructions to Governor Sharkey the President expressly informs him that the government which might result from his appointment must be understood "as provisional only." In his instructions to Governor Marvin, of Florida, he insists that the restoration contemplated by his policy must be distinctly understood as being at all times subject to the control or "approval of Congress." The proclamations upon which all other of these States were attempted to be reorganized were identical, and such was the conceded policy of the President's policy at the inception of these governments. Now, by what show of consistency do the President and the friends of these States now insist upon the inviolability of these State governments and that they are above any action we in our wisdom may see fit to take with reference to them? By whom has one conceded power been circumscribed? What power or fact now intervenes that was not then as potent as now?

But the President, pleading for the inviolability of these State governments, now insists that Congress is estopped against the imposition of any terms upon these States. He says that they "have exercised the highest functions of States, that of participating in the alteration of the Constitution of the General Government." The argument is, "they accepted the constitutional amendment abolishing slavery, therefore they have necessarily all the powers and rights of all other States." But was the part taken by those States State legislation or Federal dictation? Was that action the action of the people or the persuasion of Federal bayonets? Was the action of any legal efficacy? Was slavery even in existence to abolish? Was the sham of the passage of that amendment by those States legislation or a bargain for pardon of those who played the part of passing it? This pretended action of the States was a burlesque on the name of legislation. The State governments pretending to pass or ratify the amendment were purely the creatures of the Federal Government. Those pretended Legislatures were not known to the constitution or laws of those States, but were bodies born of Federal power and installed over those States at the point of the bayonets of the national Army, to play the part to be assigned to them by the caprices of the central power and policy of the national Executive at Washington. This pretended ratification or acceptance of the constitutional amendment was the simple playing of that part of the programme.

But how quickly this claim of the Executive dissolves at the touch of the test of his own logic. He and his partisans now insist that it is as essential that all the States should be represented in Congress to the proper submission of an amendment of the Constitution as to participate in their passage or acceptance. Yet all know this amendment, thus accepted by those States, was submitted, they not participating in the act. Thus the Executive urges upon us the indorsement of a nugatory act of the General Government as the validating act of these States. Why, we ask, does the Executive insist upon the fact that we are estopped denying the validity of these governments. From the fact that they have ratified this amendment unlawfully and unconstitutionally submitted, as he claims.

But, sir, he tells us that the executive and judicial departments have been singularly coincident in recognizing these States, and therefore again we are estopped from denying their constitutional validity. The answer to that is, that the determination of the question as to whether a pretended State government is a lawful constitutional form of government is a legislative act expressly so declared by the Supreme Court, and a question which neither the Executive nor the Supreme Court have any right to anticipate the action of Congress with reference thereto.

But, sir, are we to be seriously told that because the Supreme Court recognizes the geographical State of South Carolina as the boundary of a judicial district or State, that therefore this or that form of State government set up within that State is a valid constitutional form of government? That there is no difference between a judicial and a political State, or between a geographical State and an actual constitutional form of State government under our Constitution?

Upon such platitudes and assumptions as these the President in his recent message rises to be the mentor of this Congress. With an air of protestation against our supposed claim to impose all conditions in our judgment necessary to the public safety upon these insurgent communities, he solemnly protests "against any change by usurpation." But, sir, before the President enters his protest against our action as "usurpation" he would do well to square his own action by the maxim of his own arrogant warning to us, a coequal and coordinate department of the Government. In less than two brief years of office he has exercised more questionable powers, assumed more doubtful constitutional functions, obliterated more constitutional barriers, and interposed more corrupt schemes to the expression of the popular sentiment or will of the people than all other Executives since the existence of the Government. And such has been the verdict of the people upon his Administration. Such was the arraignment of his Administration before the people in the last elections, and such their judgment of condemnation against him.

But while for one year the Administration have arraigned us for "usurpation," from the fact that we have not conceded the legitimacy of the presidential bantlings of these insurgent State governments, how has the Administration conducted toward them? Upon his theory of the rights of these State governments, at whose door really lies the charge of usurpation toward them? This Congress, in the neglect of its duty, as I have claimed, has not yet done one positive act affecting the integrity of these governments. But in what single act of the Executive has he practically conceded their full rights as States? Has he in any instance treated these several States as anything more than military dependencies? For many months after these States were in full blast, after they had elected Senators and Representatives to this body, he held their archives in the iron chests of his military governors, and governed and ruled them by proclamations and military orders, fulminated by him from this city with all the imperious efficiency of the royal rescripts of an Alexander or Napoleon.

He suffers and provides for the convocation of their Legislatures; the time designated is fixed, not in accordance with the constitution or laws of the State, but fixed with reference to the procurement of certain legislation before the assembling of Congress, and with a view to prevent its anticipated action. But when thus assembled, their military governors advise him that it is doubtful whether they will concede the required legislation; he is advised that the "temper of the body is bad;" in fact, they are contumacious; but as a corrective the withholding of their pardons is suggested; it is done, and the legislation is obtained. The Legislatures of these pretended sovereign States enter upon the experiment of legislation; they pass enactments; but under the persuasive suggestion of arrest, trial, condemnation, and hanging of all executive, judicial, or ministerial officers of those States attempting their enforcement, the President gives to those States, to this House, and the world a practical exemplification of the powers and rights of a "sovereign State" fully reconstructed under his policy. Sir, the whole course of the President touching these States, taken with his claims to their right to be recognized by Congress, is a perfect marvel and infatuation of inconsistency.

But has he recognized these insurgent State governments as full constitutional States? How has he done it? By the appointment of provisional governors, he says. This was done, he says, to restore the suspended functions of the State government. But are not the functions of the State government and the functions of the State government inseparable? Were these provisional governors State functionaries? Were they to exercise any known constitutional functions, either of the State or national governments? Most assuredly not. They were neither creatures upon whose shoulders a lawful State government could be cast, from whose loins one could spring, nor through whose line of descent one could succeed. They are simply monsters in the whole constitutional policy and family of the Government.

Sir, upon what theory are your provisional governments established, and what is a "provisional government?" What is it, sir, but a government extemporised by the force of mere necessity alone? What is its basis in the State except the extinction of all former State government? Such was the solemn, but now forgotten proclamation of the Executive in this case. It is not a constitutional government, nor the legitimate outgrowth of such government. It is the fruit of revolution; it is the necessity of the State not yet crystalized into law; it is the revivification and return of reason to the body-politic as it startles from the embrace of anarchy, civil disability, and civil death. It is a provisional government, because no other government exists; it is a provisional government, because there is neither the power nor right of the government it deposes to provide for or perpetuate its successor. And upon any other assumption a provisional government is treason, is revolution, and anarchy in the State.

These are some of the reflections inducing my mind to the belief that it is not only the prerogative, but the duty of Congress to assume control of this matter of the reconstruction of these insurgent communities. The organization of the State governments was never claimed to have been upon any other than this express condition. The people of these States fully understood the matter, and until the Executive had placed himself, in violation of his pledges, in open hostility to the exercise of this power by Congress, would never have denied its right, nor opposed its assertion. <Whether these State governments should be allowed to continue, with the further imposition of all terms consistent with the absolute safety of the nation, and with the provision and assurance by Congress that they shall be accepted and validated upon their acceptance in good faith, or whether the loyal people of those States should be allowed and authorized by Congress to establish a government, which government should be recognized by Congress as the legal State government of those States, are means looking to the same ends, each involving the exercise of undoubted powers of Congress, and upon the adoption of either one or the other I should have no difference with the majority of this House when the same was determined upon. But, in the language of my colleague, I would require these guarantees of the national safety to be firmly embedded in the bulwarks of the Constitution. I would require them to fix forever the high endowment of national citizenship as the right of all; and place beyond peril the liberty and equal civil rights of all. I would have them declare in unequivocal language the nation's supremacy and duty on all questions and subjects affecting either, and I would gird the national Government with authority sufficient to crush every assumption of power or right to impair the one or jeopardize the enjoyment of the other.

How, sir, can we do otherwise unless we abandon the Government? There never was any alternative in this matter. Our hesitancy has been and is our weakness. The necessity of the nation demands it. The people have rejected the policy of the Executive. These States make no overtures, and they have up to this spurned any attempt on our part to offer any. The power of this Congress, backed by the loyal people, is the only power they will respect or is left for the nation to exercise in our future reconstruction. Of course we shall meet the opposition of the President, of the rebels, and the Democratic party. We have not the right nor wish to expect otherwise. Up to this time they have arrayed themselves in impotent opposition to every measure contemplated calculated to give humanity a higher elevation or to secure for it any permanent benefit as a reward for all its sacrifices and struggles in the war. And, sir, I consider this to be one of the most lamentable exhibitions of political degeneracy. What measure looking to either of these ends has received the sanction of either the Democracy or the President? Which one has not invoked their bitter and most implacable opposition? It seems to me that their whole course up to this hour has been but a merciless attempt at the crucifixion of humanity. It has been up to this time but a little less than a jargon of constitutional protests against its every effort to assert itself, and that, too, at the expense of every possible claim of political consistency.

The Democratic party in their national convention at Chicago explicitly

"Resolved, That the interference of the military authorities of the United States in the elections of the States was a shameful violation of the Constitution, and a repetition of such acts would be held as revolutionary and resisted by all the powers under their control."

At the same time their prominent leading men in Congress and elsewhere insisted that the people of the insurgent States without enabling acts of Congress could not assume their former rights of representation in Congress. But now the President steps in, and as a pure military measure stamps out the de facto State government in those States by the same military power, inaugurates new ones in their stead by that power, molds and controls and superintends all the minutest details of their governments, and denies to Congress any voice in the matter. One would naturally suppose that here is the very provocation to awaken the jealousy of the Democracy, our constitutional guardians, and stir their blood to the revolution they threatened. But all at once they lose all their abhorrence of military rule, or to the exercise of the worst and most arbitrary feature of its power.

Now, the very governments which they threatened to resist by revolution they propose to inaugurate by the same means, and their press at the North now discuss and seriously entertain the question of deposing Congress at the point of the bayonet that they may accomplish that end. Why is it, and what are the motives for this unaccountable and degrading inconsistency. I submit it is here. These governments are now the means of Democratic and rebel power. These State governments are the needed instruments of political ostracism and disfranchisement of the only loyal element of the South. Because they now need these military pretended State governments as the impassable gulf over which the national Government cannot pass, as they otherwise would, to rescue the loyal white and black man of those States from the rack and torture to which the baffled seething passions of the rebellion have consigned them.

The expedient of the Freedmen's Bureau was to be resorted to. It was a measure following in the furrows of war with the seeds of permanent peace. It proposed to take a race of four million people representing the laboring producing element of the insurgent States, "houseless, homeless wanderers on the earth," with no possible knowledge of their rights, in a society inimical to every influence that could possibly elevate or protect them, and for a temporary season protect their person, their lives, and the property acquired by their honest toil. With the Bureau directed and administered as humanity and justice demanded, the labor of those communities would have doubled their products, produced nearly a balance of foreign trade in our favor, reduced the volume of our currency an incalculable amount, and converted those States—now only a tax upon the beneficiaries of the nation—into communities contributing toward the expense of the Government, and thereby relieved the loyal North from almost the entire burdens of the war. But these military State governments, then supported and trembling upon the military arm of the nation, in fact too weak without this measure to afford protection to this class, and too infamous not to attempt it, we were told by the Democracy was the wall of adamant through which the full constitutional power of the nation could not penetrate to accomplish that end.

More than ten years since the Sultan of the Turkish empire issued and put into effect the following decree throughout his dominions:

"Every distinction or designation tending to make any class whatever of the subjects of my empire inferior to another class, on account of their religion, language, or race, shall be forever effaced from the administrative protocol. The laws shall be put in force against the use of any injurious or offensive terms either among private individuals or on part of the authorities."

Such was the concession of the civil rights to all within the dominion of the Turkish empire; concessions from a power gray and old in despotism and not under the inspirations of Christianity; they were political sentiments which shocked neither the moral nor political sense of the most abject despotism of Europe. But the Congress of the United States in the progress of events is brought to the consideration of a bill which contemplated the guarantee of the same rights to all, and what an exhibit do we witness? Day by day, and month by month an enlightened American Congress hesitate and debate the practical question, which is the prophet of humanity, Christ or Mahomet, whether human rights are assure of protection under our own boasted government as under that Ottoman dynasty which for centuries has been the outlaw of almost all civilized nations of the globe; more than this, the question is seriously debated as to the power of the nation to confer an equality of civil rights on all its subjects.

The bill finally passes; but it passes against the united vote of the Democratic party. The measure passes from this body to the representative head of the Republic and of American civilization, to the Chamber of the national Executive, and for his approval. But it comes back to us with the stamp of the dark ages upon it in the shape of a veto, having no other legitimate bearing on our national polity than the official promulgation of the fact that humanity has no rights that the Government is bound to respect. But, thank God, it is not left to the Executive, the Democratic party, nor their rebel sympathizers to attain the charter that liberty and humanity have, not only in the power but the purposes of the nation. A perverse Executive may refuse to execute this law, it may be smothered or crushed beneath the merciless platitudes of the Supreme Court; party organizations may be indifferent or hostile; men may combine to prevent its assertion, but the man, the party, the department of Government, standing in the way of the ultimate realization of the equality of all men before the law, will be ground to powder.

Sir, I notice a painful anxiety in the public mind as to the possible action of the Supreme Court touching the "civil rights bill." But, sir, I have learned to place but little reliance upon the dogmas of that court as an element of power in the nation upon any question touching the rights of humanity or the advancement of the race. As it has been administered that court has been but the chain which bound humanity helpless to the rock of pretended constitutional immutability, that its vitals might be gnawed by the cankering vices of other generations or consumed by the devouring flames of our own. It gave us the Dred Scott decision, but the chain it sought to rivet more surely and firmly on the limbs of the slave were melted in the war it invoked. And now, if the Supreme Court should take the action on this bill which some anticipate, calculating upon the moral elements and forces which move the world, I had rather have the single black soldier of the Republic, spurned as he will be from the sanctuary of the Supreme Court as he applies to it for protection, as an element of power, than all the adjudications of that court touching the rights of man or the power of the nation upon them since the organization of the Government. I do not believe that that court will be hasty to array itself against the spirit of the age, the tendency of modern thought, and the irresistible momentum with which they have to this moment uprooted each opposing obstacle.

Mr. Speaker, our action is not alone for this hour, but for all time. Our legislation addresses itself not only to the good of this generation, but of all generations of men. The stake is not alone the awful stake of the permanent peace, prosperity, and welfare of thirty million human beings, but the progress of civilization, constitutional liberty, constitutional form of government, the destiny of a continent, and the hope of liberal governments on earth. The lines of national policy and action we now draw cast their deepening shadows of national night along the whole course of our future empire until the mind shudders and starts back at the contemplation of its gloom; or they reveal the full bow of the nation's promise, its arch encompassing all mankind, and the fruition of its now painfully struggling hopes, of liberty, equality, and justice to all. Such a future I believe we control, and such a future is alone worthy of the present realizations, the heroic sacrifices, the immortal memories of the Republic.

Mr. HENDERSON. Mr. Speaker, I am disposed to appropriate the time allotted to me on the present occasion to the investigation of the following question, namely: Is Congress justified in excluding under existing circumstances the representatives from the ten States lately in rebellion against the General Government from a participation in the councils of the nation?

The President in his late message, and those who indorse his policy take the negative of this question, and urge a variety of reasons why those representatives should be immediately admitted. The President assumes that all the provisions of the Constitution of the United States applicable to States whose inhabitants are in a state of perfect loyalty to the Government of the United States should be applied to those States that have just come out of a four years' rebellion against that Government without exception. He also assumes that they are in a perfectly organized condition, and fully prepared to exercise all the functions of States and appreciate all the privileges of citizenship equally with the most loyal inhabitants of the nation. This he does, too, in the face of his own official acts at the close of the organized rebellion, when he ignored all their State constitutions, laws, and officers, and proceeded to make rules and appoint officers for their government in accordance with his own views of propriety, without reference to their will.

At this point in my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my thorough conviction that all the difficulty between the President and Congress, and the delay in admitting those States to the enjoyment of representation in the national councils, has grown out of the fact that the President ignored and trampled under foot the great principles of democracy in his attempts to reconstruct and reorganize those State governments. Why did he not call Congress together and lay the case of those States before them, and invite their cooperation in a matter so vital to the safety and well-being of the whole nation? If ever there has been a time when an extra session of Congress was demanded since the formation of this Government it was immediately following the surrender of the rebel armies. Then was needed the exercise of the wisdom of the nation; at any rate, the people were entitled to a voice in the mighty transactions. Why did the President manifest such "indecent" haste in laying down conditions and establishing rules for these States in resuming their places in the Government? It, sir, was a want of confidence in the representatives of the people, or rather a want of confidence in the people themselves, for it is always to be presumed that representatives understand and respect the will of their constituents.

That old-fashioned democracy that I learned in early life taught, first, that the people have the right to govern themselves; second, that the representative is presumed to understand and respect the will of his constituents; third, he that rejects or distrusts the representative distrusts those he represents. These are fixed principles, and in those days no true Democrat violated or controverted them. Until it is proven that the representative has betrayed the trust imposed in him his acts are entitled to full faith and credit. Had President Johnson recognized the validity of those principles and acted upon them at the proper time he and Congress, and also he and the people of the nation, would now be cooperating harmoniously in restoring and rebuilding the members of the sisterhood desolated by the tramp of hostile armies. But he distrusted the people and hastened to put into execution his own policy and plans before the representatives of the people would have an opportunity to call in question the wisdom or patriotism of his measures. In my judgment here lies the great wrong that is now plaguing the nation; and here with the President rests the responsibility.

Those who sustain the President and his policy generally urge either in justification or extenuation of the conduct of those who rebelled against the Government one or more of the following considerations:

1. An intangible, indescribable, and I presume imaginary something that has no real existence anywhere, which they denominate "State sovereignty," and which they seem to suppose existed long prior, if not to the creation of the world, at least to that of the formation of the General Government, and it is altogether independent of its Constitution and laws.

2. They tell us of certain "reserved rights" which the States never surrendered to the national Government. These they seem to think at least partially support the doctrine of secession and justify acts of rebellion against the United States Government.

3. Another circumstance which they all plead most eloquently in extenuation of the crime of rebellion is the great insults and indignities offered the slaveholding States by abolitionists and fanatics of the North.

While rebels and some of the modern democracy claim that that mysterious something which few can understand and nobody describe authorizes States to secede at will, the majority of the party shrink from an open avowal of the doctrine; yet they talk a great deal about "reserved rights," the "bad faith and bad conduct of the people of the North." In reply to that part of the democracy who deny the right of secession and still plead the "reserved rights of the States" in behalf of the rebels, I inquire what of "reserved right?" Did the States reserve to themselves at the formation of the Constitution the right to secede at their own will and pleasure? If they did, let them point to the article and section in the Constitution, and the controversy is closed; if not, why talk about such rights? What does it amount to? It proves nothing, only that those who do so are very poor reasoners.

To those who declaim so eloquently upon the "bad faith and bad conduct of the people of the North" toward their southern brethren, I reply, suppose that it all is true that you say of the people of the North, is secession and rebellion the remedy prescribed by the principles of democracy? It may be that prescribed by modern democracy, but not that of the old-fashioned kind. That kind taught "that if the people erred they would in their sober second thoughts correct their errors;" "that the people are capable of self-government," and consequently will correct their errors. If this is not true, democracy is a delusion, and the people are incapable of self-government. Hence I argue that this whole theory of "State sovereignty," "reserved rights," "secession and rebellion," as a remedy for real or imaginary evils under a republican form of government is anti-democratic and wholly unjustifiable; and all those who resort to them or advocate them as such are unworthy of the right of franchise in a free Government.

But again, rebels universally claim that the Kentucky resolutions of 1798-99 teach the doctrine that States have the right to secede, and many Democratic conventions have lately indorsed those resolutions in their platforms. Let me state this case more clearly, as I regard it an important item in this controversy. First, all secessionists claim that those resolutions declare the right of States to secede from the General Government; second, the Democracy indorse them in their platforms; and many leading Democrats declare that it was the generally received doctrine of our principal statesmen up to a very late period that States had reserved to themselves the right to secede from the Union. This they do by way of palliation for the crime of rebellion. While they have not the boldness to advocate the doctrine themselves, they will say it was the doctrine of the country.

In reference to those Kentucky resolutions, I would remind gentlemen on the other side of the House that eleven States out of the thirteen then in the Union condemned and rejected them. This circumstance proves conclusively and beyond doubt that the right of secession was not the doctrine of our country at any period. A verdict so decisive as that of eleven to two ought to have forever buried the wicked heresy beyond the possibility of resurrection.

In reading the tenth section in the first article of the Constitution of the United States I am surprised that any man should ever talk about "State sovereignty," when the States have there surrendered to the General Government everything that has the semblance of sovereignty.

We all know that "all powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people." The question again arises, what rights or powers did they reserve? Did they reserve the right to withdraw or secede from the Union? They delegated to the General Government, not only the enumerated powers in the Constitution, but the authority to make all laws necessary for carrying into execution the enumerated powers. Here opens a wide field of discretionary power to the General Government; all that is necessary to perpetuate its existence and defend itself against foreign invasion and domestic insurrection.

The idea of prescribing the means to be used by the Government in suppressing rebellion or insurrection seems never to have entered the minds of our ancestors in organizing the Government; they expected it to use means adapted to the end. In giving all power "necessary" to carry the enumerated powers of the Government into effect, they expected anything and everything that the exigency might require to be resorted to; and further, that Congress was to judge in the case. The idea of the Government taking care of rebel property, returning runaway slaves, &c., is most ridiculous. Some have argued, and do now argue, that the Government could only proceed in a constitutional way to suppress rebellion and restore order. Now, sir, I say that there is no constitutional way of fighting rebels; or rather, I will say that all means are constitutional. Whoever heard of a constitutional and lawful way of defending a house and family against robbers? Or rather, who ever heard of an unconstitutional way of doing it. All or any measure is lawful in such a case.

He whose premises are attacked by thieves and murderers may use cold water or hot water, fire and brimstone, or anything else that is available: how ridiculous the idea of prescribing the means he should use! So in reference to the Government in putting down rebellion, any means and all means are constitutional. In short, there is no Constitution on the subject. The General Government was bound by no Constitution or law in the matter except the laws of war, but was at perfect liberty to do whatever was necessary. The rebels having renounced all constitutions and laws the General Government were at perfect liberty to meet them on their own ground without law. Here I take it on myself to say that after the rebels had renounced the Constitution and laws and made war upon the United States there were no laws between the parties. The rebels having forfeited both privileges and protection under this Government they are without either still except so far as they have been conceded to them by the law-making power of the Government since their surrender.

A State of this nation could not exist outside of the Union, as it could form no alliance with other Powers, make no treaties, coin no money; in short, do nothing that pertains to sovereignty. Having examined the question of constitutional secession and finding that no such right, either expressed or implied, exists, let us investigate the second question: had their rights been so far infringed as to justify or even palliate rebellion?

Rebels and their apologists, in the second place, attempt to justify or excuse rebellion on the ground that their rights have been so terribly invaded that they were almost compelled to secede.

When we inquire what right of those States that rebelled had ever been disregarded by the General Government, the answer is stammered out about as follows: "Well, I do not know that the General Government had ever invaded any of their rights; but the abolitionists and fanatics had said a great many hard things about slavery." Mr. Seward said there "existed an irrepressible conflict between slavery and freedom," and Mr. Lincoln said the "Union could not continue half free and half slave," and Mr. Sumner called the whole thing a barbarous institution." This, Mr. Speaker, constitutes the grounds upon which the Democratic party attempt to excuse and palliate rebellion, that of the bad treatment they had received.

And rebels and secessionists justify it on the principle of State sovereignty, in the face of the declaration that the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States are the "supreme law of the land," &c.

As far as constitutional right for rebellion is concerned, the rebels themselves knew they had none; therefore they renounced Constitution, Government, and all, and fell back upon that indescribable right or power that is over and above the Constitution, State sovereignty or State rights; which I understand to be nothing more nor less than the right to inaugurate State and national anarchy.

As to their justification upon the grounds of the bad treatment they had received, Alexander H. Stephens, by far the ablest man in rebellion, in his speech in the Georgia convention, demolishes, and I may say annihilates, the very idea of such a thing. He shows conclusively that their rights have always been respected, that they have always had far more than their proportional share in both the power and patronage of the Government; at the very moment of rebellion they were enjoying more than a due share of both.

Not only so in reference to the power and patronage of the Government, but that their pet institution, slavery, was never more secure than at that time. That with a majority on the Supreme Bench, and also a majority in both Houses of Congress, the "abolition President" was powerless to harm them, even if he had ever so great a disposition to do so. President Lincoln also gave the most positive assurances that in the administration of the General Government he would most sacredly guard and protect their constitutional rights; that he had no disposition to act otherwise. And yet, sir, without even the shadow of an excuse for their conduct the people of those States rebelled against the best Government the world ever saw; plunged this nation into all the horrors of civil war, deluging the country in fraternal blood, filling the land with widows and orphans, mourning, poverty, desolation, and death; and also piling a debt upon the nation that the present generation will not live to see paid.

But having exhausted their resources, and being crushed by the power of the Government they had failed to destroy, they threw down their arms in despair and surrendered. We would now suppose there would have been no more trouble with them; having staked all and lost all they would now accept what is given them in a submissive and quiet manner. But no sir, they immediately turn upon their conquerors and demand equal rights and privileges and equal power in the Government with those who gave their property and shed their blood to maintain it. And not only so, but in regard to one class of loyalists they claim the right to disfranchise them altogether. Now, sir, the boldness and presumption of such demands are perfectly astounding! Of what crimes may men not be guilty and yet be entitled to all the rights of citizenship if such claims be recognized? I demand to know what they have done, or even said to atone for such crimes as they have committed, that they should make such demands on the Government?

Mr. Speaker, I feel perfectly satisfied that Congress has not only constitutional authority to institute for these Territories such governments as in its opinion will conduce to the general welfare of the United States, but all the circumstances of the case demand it, the condition of the loyal whites, the condition of the loyal blacks, and even that of the rebels themselves demands it. The general welfare of this nation demands it.

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HISE] in his speech on this floor denied the right of Congress to govern Territories at all. It might survey the lands and provide for their disposal, but had no authority to make any rules to regulate the conduct of settlers upon them—"all laws made for such purpose are unwarranted assumptions." When reminded by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. KELLEY] of the ordinance of 1787, excluding slavery from the Territory, the old gentleman was cornered, and I believe would have wilted if the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINCK] had not come to the rescue by stating that this ordinance was passed before the formation of the Constitution. This suggestion placed my Kentucky friend again upon his legs.

The question arose in my mind whether the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINCK] knew that that ordinance was re-affirmed by the First Congress that sat under the national Constitution, or whether he was willing to make a false impression for the sake of relieving his friend. If the fact that the First Congress had re-affirmed that ordinance and thereby made it its own had been presented to him I presume the Kentucky gentleman would have felt the land slide from under him a second time; but in that case "ignorance was bliss." Now, Mr. Speaker, the idea that the gentlemen who composed the First Congress under the Constitution did not understand that instrument, as many of them sat in the Convention that formed it, or that they would willfully violate it, is too ridiculous to be entertained. And this is the position in which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HISE] places himself, either that the members of that Congress did not understand the Constitution that some of them helped to make and all had sworn to support, or that they willfully violated their oaths. Such are the straights to which modern Democrats are driven in support of false theories.

But to return to the people in those rebel States, or rather to the rebels themselves. Their conduct since their surrender has surprised me far more than their acts of rebellion. For that I was prepared to look. But, sir, that they should so soon be crawling around the capital of the nation they had labored so earnestly to destroy, pleading for pardons, amnesty, &c., is more than I was prepared to expect. Where now is their "high-toned chivalry"? Where that noble "Norman blood that coursed their aristocratic veins, rendering them the superior race"? Where now those noble "lords of the soil," upon whom the necessity to govern this nation was forced, they being the only statesmen competent to rule? Whining for representation in the Congress of the nation they so recently invoked the aid of foreigners to destroy; begging for seats in those Halls that they so indignantly and unceremoniously left a short time since. "How are the mighty fallen?" I confess, sir, that my estimate of southern chivalry and spirit has suffered a sad decline. Old Henry A. Wise is the only man among them that has sustained his manhood and that challenges my respect.

According to my information he lent his aid to destroy the Government, and being foiled in his attempt, heroically refuses to ask any favors at its hand, quietly accepting its offers without murmur or complaint. A mind of that mold, however much I may think it has erred, commands my respect. Had the rebels succeeded in replacing the stars and stripes with the confederate flag and establishing its power over this nation I should never have cast a vote under its folds nor asked representation in its councils, but, with old Henry Wise, accepted in silence what it gave, or remove my fortunes beyond the limits of its power.

The mad haste in which those rebels lifted up the heel against this Government and their instant waiting for the ballot when the sword was wrenched from their grasp prove them unworthy of the franchise and incompetent for self-government.

Mr. Speaker I am well persuaded that the prosperity and happiness of the inhabitants of those territories, the quiet and security of the country require the organization by Congress of territorial governments for each of those former States, under which the loyal inhabitants shall be fully protected and placed in the exercise of political power, while the rebellious are held in subjugation until subordination and good government be fully established.

I do not consider that any man has either a political or moral right to the elective franchise under this Government who is not truly loyal to it. I do not regard any man as loyal who is disposed to lionize rebel chiefs or drink to the "fallen flag." "Just so long as they justify or attempt to justify their rebellion against the Government of the United States they are unfit for representation in its Congress, and ought to be excluded therefrom." How can a man act with reference to the peace and prosperity of a Government that he believes to be unjust and ought to be destroyed? How could an honest man swear to support a Constitution and laws that he believed ought to be abolished?

I have intimated, Mr. Speaker, in what I have said that I would favor the extension of suffrage to colored persons in the rebel States. Permit me to state my position fairly upon this delicate question. Being a native of Kentucky and educated among slaveholders it is hardly to be expected that I would be altogether free from their prejudices.

In my early childhood I saw that the black people around me were slaves, and I supposed that to be right. I saw that the whites were free, and I supposed that to be right; but I saw also that there were many that were half white and half black. This class perplexed me much; but I ultimately came to the conclusion that they ought to be free half the time; and lest they should die before mid-life and not enjoy the sweets of liberty at all, I concluded they ought to be free the first half, and thereby secure to freedom its share. On reaching more mature years, however, I became satisfied that liberty was the God-given right of all men; that in point of natural rights all men are created equal.

Since the rejection of the Wilmot proviso, which proviso I then believed to be right, and still believe was so, I have uniformly cast my votes against the extension and spread of slavery. When General Cass "swung around the circle" and the Democratic party with him and landed on the pro-slavery side, I quit the Democracy, and cast my vote for Mr. Van Buren, the anti-slavery candidate for President in 1848, and to-day I am proud of the stand I then took.

But, Mr. Speaker, I have always believed that it would be better for both races that the whites and blacks should be separated, and that each should live in a country to themselves. I most heartily accord to the black man all the rights that I claim for myself, but I would greatly prefer that he should enjoy his in one country and I mine in another. I believe the white man is here by the providence of God. I believe that Columbus was guided and sustained by the Divine hand. The white man is here in accordance with his own voluntary agency. Therefore I conclude that this is his home according to the will of God.

Not so with the black man, he was dragged here by force and violence in opposition to his will. Hence, I conclude he is here by the providence of the devil and agency of wicked men, in opposition to natural law and the will of God. I do not wish him forced away, that would be almost as bad as forcing him here; but I do expect Providence, in unrolling the scroll of the future to him, to make such developments as will cause him to choose to emigrate.

But, sir, while he is here, God being my helper, I will do him justice. When President Lincoln proposed procuring territory in Central or South America as a home for colored people, and dispatched Senator POMEROY as the agent of our Government to procure it, I indorsed the idea, believing that its fulfillment would promote the welfare of both races; and about that time canvassing my State as a candidate for Congress, I took ground against giving the right of suffrage to colored men among us, and having taken in the canvass the ground I did I felt bound twelve months ago to vote against the suffrage bill for this District.

But Mr. Lincoln's plan of securing country in South America for a home for the people of color having vanished, and no prospect for their emigration in any other direction presenting itself, I feel that justice demands that he shall have the ballot. This is the only defense, of which I am informed, for the black or any other class of men against injustice and oppression. While I regret taking any step that can be construed by him into an invitation to make a permanent location among us, I still feel that as he is here without his own will or agency we are morally bound to extend to him the protection of the ballot.

But, sir, while I am disposed to extend impartial suffrage to all male citizens independent of color, I do not consider that consistency requires me to extend it to females of any color. Did I believe the happiness of females or the general welfare of society required it, I should be among the first to advocate its extension to them. I am unwilling, however, to admit that the interests of the sexes is so distinct as to demand a representation from both.

In legislating for my own happiness I necessarily secure that of my wife and daughters. The happiness of the husband is composed in so large a part in seeing his wife and daughters happy, that in promoting their happiness he necessarily promotes his own. In short, their interests are so intimately and inseparably joined, that I perceive not the necessity for authorizing both to do that which one can perform, I think, equally as well. In respect to the interests of widows and single ladies, it is not desirable or expected that they shall remain in that condition long, at any rate not longer than till they meet with a favorable opportunity to change their state.

"The strongest argument that I have read in support of female suffrage is that which claims that all persons brought before courts for criminal offenses 'should be tried by a jury of their peers,' and that females have never enjoyed this right. However plausible this may appear, it is altogether fallacious, as it is a well known fact that males are far more lenient to females, under such circumstances, than females are to each other.

Man, as I am, if I had to be brought before court I would not object to being tried by a jury of females; but were I a lady I should enter my solemn protest against being tried before a female court and jury.

Taking all things into consideration, I have no idea that the happiness of females or the general welfare of society would be promoted by placing the elective franchise in their hands, or even in making them equally eligible to position and power. I think, however, that I am unprejudiced on this subject, and ready to receive further light.

In designating who in the States lately in rebellion against the General Government should vote, I would admit the white man who has always been loyal, because he has never forfeited his rights. I would admit the loyal negro, because he is loyal and would study the welfare of the Government; I would reject the disloyal white man, because I think him an unsafe depository of power; and I would reject the disloyal negro for the same reasons.

I would admit the loyal man, white or black, to the rights of franchise because he is loyal, and consequently a safe depository of political power; and I would reject the disloyal, white or black, because he is disloyal, and therefore an unsafe depository of power. I do not, however, give the negro as much credit for what fighting he did during the late rebellion as many do. I have not thought that he fought so much to save the Government as to secure his own freedom. I have no doubt he would have fought just as bravely on the other side if he had thought that was the side to which he could look for freedom, and he would have been justified in so doing. But had he fought on the side of the rebels under then existing circumstances he would have showed himself unworthy of freedom; but as he knew which side to fight on, he has shown himself capable of judging which is the right side to vote on.

Before closing my remarks, I wish to pay my respects to a statement that has been often repeated by members of the so-called Democratic party, both in and out of this Hall; that is, the great prosperity of this country while under the administration of their party, and the war and devastation under Republican administration. Let me use a figure to illustrate the character of this boasting: a certain vessel was navigated by her crew for many leagues safely and speedily upon a calm sea, but all the time in the exact direction of a maelstrom until the vessel was caught and carried rapidly around in its circling waters. At this juncture the captain folded his hands and sat down, exclaiming at the same time, "No earthly power can save the ship; she is bound to go down in the vortex!" His under officials all forsake their posts and begin to rob and pillage the vessel. The owners of the ship have from the shore discovered the state of affairs and sent out a new crew, who step on board. The new commander grasps the helm, puts the ship about, spreads all sail, and heads for the open sea.

But she struggles and quivers in every beam under the war of elements; the contest is doubtful for a time; but ultimately the crisis is past, and the ship is sailing slowly into port. At this juncture the old crew gather around and chide the new officers for their slow progress and laborious navigation, telling them how splendidly they had sailed and how prosperous the voyage while under their control. But, to cap the climax of their folly, the old crew ask to be again employed and put in command of the ship!

I admit, Mr. Speaker, that the Democratic party notified us that if we elected Abraham Lincoln for President they would dissolve the Union; and they now tell us that if the Republican party had let them continue to rule they would not have rebelled; and as that party could very easily have stayed at home and not voted for Mr. Lincoln, or have gone to the polls and voted for Breckinridge, and would not do so; therefore they are chargeable with all the blood and carnage, death and destruction of the war.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, their Democracy amounts to about this: if the people of this nation will just simply let them rule, whether they are in the majority or minority, they will then be loyal and peaceable; but if the people vote them out of power they will then haul down the national flag, seize the public property, deluge the land in fire and blood, and then charge it all on the Republicans. Such persons would more appropriately style themselves democrats.

But, sir, in this country we intend that the majority shall rule. And rather than surrender our right to elect the man of our choice to the Presidency we will see this continent swept as clean as the top of the Tyrean rock.

FINANCE, BANKS, AND CURRENCY.

Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, we hear much said about reducing the amount of money in circulation to a sum which shall answer the legitimate demands of trade. All assent to this. But the question arises; what is that sum; and by what process of reasoning do gentlemen arrive at their conclusions?

It is assumed that it must be so much and no more, as that upon demand of the holder every dollar bill shall be convertible into coin. If that is to be the standard, then the circulation is not regulated by the wants of the people, but by the quantity of coin to be used in its redemption. If there is no coin, there must be no currency. Is that the conclusion grave statesmen and financiers propose to adopt in the present crisis of our country?

HOW MUCH COIN HAVE WE?

Mr. McCulloch sets our coin down at eighty or one hundred millions. Will that amount supply our people with money sufficient for all the purposes of trade and traffic, whereby our produce of every character is to pass into the market by buying and selling? All men of reason know it will not. Eighty million dollars allow barely two dollars apiece to each individual. Will two dollars to each afford sufficient money to buy and sell $6,000,000,000 worth of property each year; pay $500,000,000 of national tax; $250,000,000 of State and local taxes; *run forty thousand miles of railroad, that cost $1,500,000,000 in their structure; as many miles of canal, lake and river navigation; fill up the demand of trust funds, executors, administrators and guardians; supply merchants, mechanics, and tradesmen with money for their business purposes, amounting to hundreds of millions, to say nothing about the wants of the people engaged in the ten thousand other pursuits of legitimate productive industry requiring money? No man is so stupid, surely, as to suppose eighty or one hundred million dollars will answer.

HOW THEN?

Why, says one, bankers think it safe to issue three dollars in paper for one in coin, so we can have three times eighty millions of paper issued upon the eighty in coin, giving us $240,000,000 for circulation. This is about Secretary McCul-

* The tax levied in Ohio and collected in 1866 was rising $20,500,000—three fourths of it for local purposes, a large portion of which must necessarily remain under lock and key during a great part of the year; if the other States raise taxes in proportion, then it cannot be doubted that from fifty to one hundred millions of money must lie constantly in the State, county, and township treasuries, withdrawn from circulation.

loch's view, and to this end the whole machinery of the Government under his control is drifting. So he promises to allow us six or seven dollars apiece, two thirds of it shadow, bank shadows at that, and thus he proposes to usher in the financial millennium of specie payment—specie payment! as if that was the only thing for which people were born or Governments made.

SUPPOSE A PANIC?

Suppose some rash statesman, or one even so prudent and thoughtful as our Secretary of the Treasury, (who thought it not impolitic in his annual communication to denounce his own greenback circulation as unconstitutional,) should assail the credit of the banks and denounce their money as irredeemable; a run is made upon them, and in less than ten days the $80,000,000 of coin is drawn out. What is there left of substance to promise redemption of the remaining $160,000,000 which the people have taken upon trust after the confiding assurances of the Secretary of the Treasury that it would all be right and so much better and safer than Governor Chase's greenbacks, that being unconstitutionally issued were of course illegal and void?

BROKERS OF WALL STREET.

The brokers of New York are always powerful enough to start a bank panic whenever they see a chance to make a speculation out of it. They now hold the gold market in their clutches, and Mr. McCulloch, with the whole Government at his back, and with seventy or eighty millions of coin in the Treasury, cannot move them nor affect the premium upon gold a farthing, except as they choose to have him do. If these money-mongers can thus besiege the Government, what may they not do with the unshielded banks of the country, that with $80,000,000 of coin undertake to supply three times that amount in currency that shall be redeemable in coin at all times?

So much for the experiment of a circulation redeemable in specie. So much for putting away a safe, sound, reliable national currency, that has the confidence of the people, because it is the promise of their own Government, and a lien upon its resources, and adopting a theory that our country has again and again proved, by sad experience, within the memory of the present generation, as utterly visionary and ruinous.

WHAT THE PEOPLE WANT.

Gold and silver is the universal currency, and of course we desire it above all other; but we do not expect to be able, with $80,000,000 of coin, if now in active circulation, to carry on our internal commerce, involving as it does the property of every kind and description of near forty millions of people, occupying so large and so productive a portion of the earth. We must have a currency adequate to the business wants of our people, whatever that may be. When the coin is insufficient we must have the next best, and greenbacks with so good an indorser as the Government, greenbacks that pay debts, pay taxes, buy land, buy bread and raiment, how better or safer could we provide ourselves with a currency? Suppose that even with greenbacks a panic were possible, who could be injured? There is no private bank to run down and bankrupt and leave bill-holders and depositors to suffer. No, it is the great Government that stands responsible to the people for every dollar; and when the panic has expended its fury and passed, the holder of a greenback has a reality, a certainty, a currency that panics and brokers and money gamblers cannot destroy, nor lessen the security that is pledged for its payment. A greenback is good to-day, to-morrow, or it may be laid away with your gold until next month or next year or next generation and like your gold still good for its face, good at home or abroad, good at all times, in all places, and for all purposes. Verily this is money, the people's money; to call it irredeemable is to libel both our Government and people. It is the promise of the people themselves to pay, and to make good that promise the collective and individual wealth of the nation stands irrevocably pledged. Higher security could not be given.

OUR PRESENT CIRCULATION.

When men talk of reducing the circulation to $300,000,000 do they consider the depressing effect of such reduction upon the people? Prices at this time are not unreasonable; beef, corn, pork—these cannot be afforded by the farmer at less than the present market value thereof, and yet at this time our currency, that which we use as such in one way or another, amounts to over $1,600,000,000! Now, reduce this enormous sum to $300,000,000, the amount claimed by the Secretary of the Treasury as sufficient, and where will the farmer be with his products? You propose a reduction of the currency for the express purpose of reducing prices, and if it be true that prices increase as you increase the quantity of money, then the present prices must fall to one fifth of their present rate.

That I may not mislead any person by my statement as to the amount of circulation now employed as money, let me give the facts upon which it is predicated. By the report of the Secretary of the Treasury of December 3, 1866, there was outstanding on the 31st October, 1866, of the public debt the following items:

Compound-interest notes.....	$148,512,140
Seven-thirty bonds.....	724,014,300
Greenbacks.....	390,135,980
Fractional currency.....	27,588,010
Gold certificates.....	10,896,980
	<hr/>
	1,801,207,410
Add coin in Treasury, say.....	70,000,000
National bank bills.....	300,000,000
Total.....	$1,671,207,410

Now, each of these items is used in some way or other as a substitute for money in the varied and extensive business transactions of the country. The banks are required to keep a reserve fund of fifteen per cent. of their circulation and deposits, which may be set down at $120,000,000, that lies dormant in their vaults and cannot be used without a violation of law; but instead of fifteen per cent. they will be found to have retired about twenty-five per cent., making in the aggregate some $160,000,000. Of this reserved fund most of it is the compound-interest notes, not a dollar of which is permitted to go into general circulation. If bankers have not secured and retired it all, private individuals, having spare funds reserved for special use in the future, have appropriated it in the same way, because, unlike greenbacks or national bank bills, it is accumulating all the while, and when the holder wants to use it it is larger in quantity by the accumulation of interest than when stowed away.

So also of the seven-thirty bonds: they are issued in the similitude of bank bills, and almost as convenient as a circulation; they bear interest at seven and three tenths per cent., with coupons attached payable every six months. What better thing could a man lay away to meet a future call than a seven-thirty bond? If a man has $1,000 not needed for present use, but expects to use it a year hence; he chooses not to loan it, for its return when needed may not be certain; he does not lay away greenbacks or national bank bills, because at the end of the year those bills remain of the same value as when retired; he converts his $1,000 into seven-thirties, and these at the end of the year are just as good as greenbacks, and seventy-three dollars more in the bulk than when deposited by him. It requires very little argument to convince men who have an eye to thrift, what course to pursue in such cases, and therefore I shall be believed, I presume, when I assert that the seven-thirties, serving the purpose of money are largely engrossed, if not almost totally, in the reserved funds of moneyed institutions and moneyed men. So also of the gold certificates: these pay customs duty on foreign importations; the gold is never drawn from the Treasury; it lies there, and the certificates answer for the coin; take away the certificates and the coin must move; the certificate is money just as much as one thing can be made a representative of another.

Our currency, then, amounts actually at this time to $1,671,000,000! This is very large, indeed; but when we come to group up all the items of trade and traffic of this vast empire, the character of our people, their industry, their enterprise, the development of the resources of our country, its soil, its mines of gold, of silver, of copper, of iron, of coal, its rivers, its canals and railroads, its machinery, by which the labor of man is increased a hundredfold in productive efficiency, we can begin to realize that a country, stretching from ocean to ocean, with an active, enterprising population of near forty millions, busily employed everywhere upon its surface, developing its resources and piling up wealth almost beyond the conception of man—such a people, with such a country, to accomplish the work before them must necessarily require a currency of large capacity.

It is quite probable $1,600,000,000 is too much: that is a question for the people to determine who use it. But suddenly to reduce this vast sum to one fifth its present amount would inevitably disturb the settled condition of our internal commercial traffic, and needlessly and wantonly bankrupt thousands of our active and enterprising people, who, rather than remain idle while politicians are arguing the currency question, have embarked in business, trusting to the good sense of those controlling the public affairs, for wise and prudent measures that whatever change may be resolved upon shall be brought about, not rashly, but by easy stages, that will give timely warning to all of coming events, and thus prepare all for the change.

EXTENT OF OUR BUSINESS.

To arrive at any safe conclusion as to the amount of money required for the business of the country we must know something of the extent of the country and the amount of the trade it affords. In 1850 the value of the real and personal property of the United States was $7,000,000,000. In 1860 it was $16,000,000,000. Taking the increase from 1850 to 1860 as a criterion to judge of the increase from that to the present time, say six years, during which time our people have been more than usually active in all industrial pursuits, and accumulated more rapidly than at any former period, and we may set down the wealth of the country (leaving out the valuation of slaves) at $25,000,000,000.

Mr. McCulloch in his report says that the annual products of agriculture, manufactures, mining, mechanic arts, commerce, fisheries, and forests amount to one fourth of the entire wealth of the country. If he is correct then we have a yearly production in 1866 of over $6,000,000,000 of property; all of this during the year is in some way or other measured by money; money to buy, money to sell, money to pay labor, money to buy food and clothing, money to carry to market, money for everything in the progress of production, in transportation, in selling in market—money at every step. Can $3,000,000 of currency fill up the ten thousand reservoirs of retired money that is withdrawn entirely from circulation to await the convenience of the owners, and yet be adequate to supply the wants of near forty million people, whose labor adds to the wealth of the country annually, over $6,000,000,000 worth of property?

OUR NATIONAL TAX.

The revenue collected into our national Treasury in 1866 amounted to the enormous sum of $462,000,000. Now, with a currency of $300,000,000 only, how does any financier imagine this vast Government tax is to be paid—yes, paid promptly—and yet leave a surplus sufficient to answer the demands of forty million people, with their $6,000,000,000 of fresh productions, thrown annually upon the public market, to be bought and sold with money?

It cannot be done: and it is folly, it is madness to attempt it; nay, it would be a crime, involving in its consequences the general stagnation of business and universal bankruptcy. Who can contemplate such meditated folly without blushing for the manifest want of financial skill and foresight of the statesmen who advise such measures, at a time, too, when every interest in the land is prospering and the people never better satisfied, not only with the prices of labor and productions, but with the quantity and kind of money they are using?

Shall we blindly yield to such teaching that, with the syren song of specie payment, we shall give away the unrivaled prosperity of the present for a future of idleness, of poverty, of suffering! for without the incentive to industry—and nothing is more necessary for this than money—there will be no activity in the industrial pursuits of the country.

Who call for this restrictive system? who ask the currency to be dwarfed to $300,000,000? Do the people clamor at the Halls of Congress by their petitions begging us to diminish the currency to $300,000,000? Do the people ask the withdrawal of "greenbacks" and invoke specie in its stead, that prices may thereby be crushed down to the standard of hard money, when that hard money they are told by our Minister of Finance is less than $100,000,000, and that he has to keep looked up as a safety-fund for the Government?

LOW PRICES DESIRED.

Mr. McCulloch says prices are too high, and by reducing the currency he hopes to bring down prices. The farmer of Ohio sells his pork at six dollars a hundred, his corn at fifty cents a bushel, and all other marketable commodities at like prices. Is he too well paid? Reduce the currency to a third or a fourth of its present volume, and where will the farmer be? No, Mr. Speaker, the farmer asks for no such policy; the people make no such request; they are all anxious for specie payment, but they are wise enough and patient enough to bide their time and be content with "well enough" until better can be had without incurring great risks or taking violent and dangerous medicine.

"Increased production and lower prices," says Secretary McCulloch, "will bring about specie payment." That means that the farmer who now sells one hog for twenty dollars must hereafter raise two or three hogs in order to get the sum of twenty dollars; that is increasing production and reducing price. But for whose benefit? Certainly not the farmer's. It will enable the Secretary, perhaps, to realize his favorite theory of specie payment; but it is an achievement that will cost the people a sacrifice that no man should exact, that he may glory in the success of a dogma that never promised anything but a curse to his country.

LOW PRICES AND HIGH TAXES.

While we are persuaded by the Secretary that low prices are essential to specie payment, we are also informed by him that large taxes will still be required. The people were not ignorant of this, and, in view of that fact, they have wisely concluded that liberal prices would be some compensation for high taxes. While a load of corn will pay a tax bill of forty dollars the farmer does not murmur at contributing liberally to relieve the Government; and hence the revenue runs up to a million a day without effort, without a murmur. But break down the prosperity of the producing interests of the country; bring pork and beef and corn down to a specie standard, and then a wail of woe will go up from every farmer in the land, and your collectors will be compelled to make beggarly returns of delinquents, and bankruptcy will become an epidemic extending from the people to the national Treasury.

BANKERS WANT MONEY SCARCEN.

Mr. McCulloch says:

"The conservative bankers of the country are quite unanimously in favor of a curtailment of the currency, with a view to an early return to specie payment."

That may be the feeling of the conservative bankers. Bankers, like other people, consult their own interests. The more contracted the currency the greater the demand for it, and of course the higher the rate of interest. That is not all. Men who have nothing but money, and who operate with money, are well pleased when that money will command the highest price. A twenty-dollar bill, with which a banker can now buy a fat hog of a farmer, will, in a few months, under a stringent currency, buy two or even three such fat hogs. Conservative bankers know that when money is tight they have their harvest; when money is abundant the money-monger has but half the bargain; let it become scarce and he is "master of the situation." All men of fixed salaries, all holders of public or private bonds, office-holders, bankers, brokers, men of large means and large leisure, all these will be advantaged by restricted circulation and specie payment; but the producing laboring classes readily perceive that their interests do not lie in that direction. They prefer a flush currency, reliable and trustworthy, that gives facility to trade in all its various forms; and which can be conveniently and cheaply obtained for use. Let it be a fixed stable currency, and if it cannot have a good word of indorsement from the Secretary who sends it out as money; let him at least forbear to brand it as unconstitutional, and let it grow into public favor and confidence by its own inherent virtues. Let the people use and trust it as the people's money, their own pledges of faith, to be redeemed by themselves in their own time and their own way. If the people are content with the currency as it is, why should the Government distress itself to change it? The currency and the Government are both made for the people; and when the people are satisfied who has a right to complain? who has a right to crowd upon them new schemes, full of peril if not calamitous beyond measure? The instincts of the people are safer to be trusted than the dogmas of a Secretary who has fallen in love with his own theory and can therefore see no fault in it. Public officers are but the servants of the people; they should follow, not dictate, public opinion. It will be time enough to employ the energies of the Government in the direction of specie payment when the voice of the people shall indicate their will on that subject. Until then all the disturbing efforts of influential men on that subject only increase the agitation in the circulation, and expose those whose property is thrown upon the market to all the evil consequences of that foolish and dangerous intermeddling.

HOW SPECIE PAYMENT WILL COME.

If gentlemen wish to know when we shall have specie payment I can tell them: whenever the people are ready to pay their taxes in specie, then the Government will be able to pay in specie, and then the long-desired blessing will have descended upon us. It cannot come at the other end of the line, as Mr. McCulloch proposes; it must begin with the people, and as they have to take the initiative, I propose that they shall be the judges of the time and the manner. When they are tired of greenbacks they will not be slow to say so. When they find they have too much money, they will speak out; when their produce is too high or their taxes too low, you will hear from them; when they shall desire to pay their taxes in coin rather than currency, they will give notice thereof, and then the Secretary may well prepare for the new order of things, and his base of operations will be reliable and fully justify any vigorous measures to that end. But until the people speak let their public servants keep silence. By constant agitation they give the money market a feverish uneasiness that unsettles values and exposes the owners of property of all kinds, but especially such as enter the market for sale, to injurious and depreciating fluctuations, merely to gratify the whims of a public officer, more ambitious than wise, more intent upon propagating a financial dogma than to advance the great substantial interests of the people.

OUR NATIONAL BANKS.

I do not propose to make war upon our national banks. In many respects they are as well devised as could be desired to secure to the people who receive their circulation the ultimate redemption of every dollar, and being under the entire control of Congress to revise, modify, or in any manner and to any extent to change the law by which they are created, there is every possible security against abuses which have heretofore grown up in such institutions. Yet I can very readily discern that if we were now called upon to inaugurate such a system how we could improve upon the experience of the past. We pay these banks $18,000,000 annually for the privilege of using their currency, whereas our Government has as good paper currency of its own that might just as well be used for the same purpose and cost us nothing.

Banks we shall always have; no one is bold enough to claim that this extensive country can carry on its business with the spirit of enterprise and industry that characterize our people without the aid of banks. But it would have been well if our Government had furnished the circulation and thus saved the interest upon $300,000,000 of its public debt, which interest now goes to the banks as a compensation for the use of their paper money which is certainly no better, if so good, as the Government money, of which we have an abundance and the means of making more when it shall be needed.

SPECIE PAYMENT—HOW?

But here we are met by our Secretary, who, anxious for specie payment, insists upon withdrawing from circulation all greenbacks, and then make a run upon the national banks and force them to specie payment or to bankruptcy.

Let us look at this a moment. Imagine the greenbacks all retired and the national banks called on to redeem their notes in specie; can they do it? No, sir; they have no specie; how then? They must call upon their debtors to pay their bills in specie. There are $400,000,000 due them from the people, who have borrowed of them—an ample sum to redeem every dollar of their issue. Can the people raise the specie? No, sir; it is not in the country. Mr. McCulloch says there is scarce $100,000,000 in the United States, and he keeps from fifty to seventy millions of that locked up for fear it will leave us. Now impossibilities are required of no one: here is a thing insisted upon which every reasonable man must see is a bare absurdity and cannot be accomplished. Very well; the borrower cannot pay specie to the banks, and the banks cannot pay specie for their notes; what then? Why, the Secretary proceeds to wind them up; he puts their $300,000,000 of registered bonds, which are deposited as surety for the redemption of their circulation, upon a forced market, to raise the gold to redeem the national currency. He may be successful, but if so it is a success full of calamities to the country; a financial crisis ensues, which bankrupts hundreds of thousands of enterprising, industrious citizens, paralyzes trade, deranges the finances of the Government, breaks down its revenues, and little less than universal ruin of Government and people is the result of this master-stroke of finance to bring forward premature specie payment.

It requires small foresight to see the tendency of this theory of Mr. McCulloch, and the only marvel is that of all men he alone refuses to be instructed.

STOP THIS WAR UPON THE CURRENCY.

With a continuation of this war upon our currency by high public functionaries no banking institution issuing paper for circulation could ever resume specie payment without providing itself with coin equal to dollar for dollar of circulation. The result would be an exclusive hard-money currency; and as we are assured that we have less than $100,000,000 of coin, more than half of which is in the United States Treasury under lock and key, it presents a gloomy picture for our people to look upon and extract hopes for a prosperous future. It may suit bondholders and office-holders, but it will be ruin to the men of labor, who have a right to look to the Government for support for a currency the best possible, and in quantity sufficient for all the purposes of legitimate trade. If coin can be furnished adequate to the demand, that we ask first; failing that, then the next best; and whether the one or the other, give us enough.

HOW TO SECURE FOREIGN MARKET.

The Secretary says the currency must be reduced so that prices shall go down so low that we shall be compelled to send our produce to foreign markets. The best market for our people is the home market; and it will be a joyful day to us when, by the course of trade, our corn, pork, beef, and flour are not only bought at home, but consumed at home; when the iron and cloths and manufactured fabrics of all kinds, now imported, are produced at home. This may be done by encouraging labor, not by oppressing it.

But how does our foreign trade stand? Mr. McCulloch says it is largely against us. Let us see. By his own record we find the following:

Fiscal Year.	Value of Imports.	Value of Exports.
1859.....	$338,765,130	$356,789,432
1860.....	362,163,941	400,122,296
1861.....	350,775,835	410,856,812
1862.....	205,819,823	220,790,280
1863.....	252,187,587	331,809,459
1864.....	328,514,559	340,665,580
1865.....	234,434,167	336,697,123

"For the five years prior to and including 1861 the average annual value of imports was in excess of $350,000,000; and for the three years next succeeding June 30, 1861, the annual average has been about $332,000,000."

How is it that the advantages of foreign trade are only to be secured by a limited currency and low prices in this country? Before the war, and before prices were high here, when corn was forty cents a bushel, wheat one dollar, and pork $3 50 per hundred, our imports of foreign goods were $90,000,000 a year more than they were when prices arose to their highest point during the war. It is true, also, that our exports were larger before the war than since; but that alone depends upon the foreign demand. We can only sell abroad when there is a call for our products. Contracting the currency and cheapening the price will not always succeed, and if they did it would be poor economy to bankrupt our farmers for the privilege of selling their products in a foreign market.

MONEY OF OTHER COUNTRIES.

The money of England is about twenty-five dollars to each individual. England is compact, covering but a small surface, and the trade capable of being carried on with much greater facility and less money than ours. Give us twenty-five dollars of currency per head and we will have $1,000,000,000 of circulation.

France has about thirty-six dollars per head of money. Even France requires much less currency for the business of trade than our country. Give us the same as France employs and we shall have over $1,400,000,000 of circulation. England and France have not discovered that they had too much money. The ministers of finance in those countries have not discovered that prices were too high, or that labor was too well paid. By referring to those old and experienced countries we can realize how we have been able to employ as money with such splendid success the $1,600,000,000 already noticed; and it may serve to caution us against that certain ruin that awaits us if we shall disregard the plainest dictates of reason and the experience of the most prosperous and stable Governments of the world upon this very subject.

THE PUBLIC DEBT.

The Secretary reports our present debt at $2,681,636,966. He has a surplus in the Treasury of $130,326,960, which he expects to increase at the end of this year $79,330,856. These two sums being applied to the payment of the debt will leave June 30, 1867, a balance of $2,471,979,150; of which the following items bear no interest:

Greenbacks.....	$390,195,980
Fractional currency.....	27,588,010
Gold certificates.....	10,896,980
Total.....	$428,680,970

which sum being subtracted leaves $2,043,298,180 of the public debt bearing interest.

The receipts for the next fiscal year, ending June 30, 1868, are estimated as follows:

From customs.....	$145,000,000 00
From internal revenue.....	255,000,000 00
From lands.....	1,000,000 00
From miscellaneous sources.....	25,000,000 00
Total.....	$426,000,000 00

The expenditures are estimated as follows:

For the civil service.....	$50,067,342 08
For pensions and Indians.....	25,383,489 09
For the War Department, including $34,000,000 for bounties.....	110,861,961 89
For the Navy Department.....	30,251,605 26
For interest on the public debt.....	133,678,243 00
Total.....	$50,247,641 32

Leaving a surplus of estimated receipts over estimated expenditures of..... $85,752,358 68

By the foregoing it will be seen that the interest item is over $133,500,000, and that out of a revenue of $426,000,000 to be collected only $85,500,000 are left to be paid upon the principal of the debt.

A NEW POLICY—FIVE PER CENT. BONDS.

Now, sir, suppose we change the programme, and while we lessen the burden of taxation we at the same time accommodate our people with a currency, not only adequate to the demands of the country, but one that, all things considered, will be the most stable and uniform, and which has secured and will retain the confidence of the people. I propose to fix the circulation at $1,000,000,000, exclusive of fractional currency and gold certificates; this to be done 1st July, 1867, the beginning of the next fiscal year. I propose, further, that five per cent. bonds be prepared, and that all the outstanding debts (except the ten-forties, which are five per cents.) be paid off at maturity, and that whatever indebtedness shall remain be in bonds, drawing five per cent. and no more.

By this method we shall save over thirty millions annually in interest. Our ten-forty bonds are now at par and no good reason can be assigned why we may not be able to make our entire debt a five per cent. The English debt bears but three per cent.; it is one half larger than ours, and not half so well secured nor the payment so certain or so soon; indeed it is doubted if the debt of England will ever be paid, while our debt is in process of rapid payment, with the prospect of its total extinction, if desirable, even by the generation that created it. The larger portion of the public debt of the leading nations of Europe bears but three per cent. The debt of France, about two thousand millions, and not a dollar of its principal has been paid for years, and which is constantly increasing, two thirds of it is at three per cent.

We may not be able to sell our bonds in a foreign market; it is not desirable if we could. It is part of our good fortune that in the time of our greatest necessities for money we were able to obtain it from our own people. The present ten-forty bonds are in the hands of our own people, and it will be an important achievement if by any plan to be adopted we can call back our bonds from foreign holders and place them permanently in the hands of our own citizens. To secure a home market for our bonds it is worth while to present some inducements, which I think may be done with advantage to Government and people. Let us consider that question a moment. Our national banks have now about four hundred millions of our bonds; these are fixed and will not soon float upon the market. The whole South and part of the western States are unsupplied with banks, and it will become necessary in a short time to extend bank facilities to them, perhaps to the extent of $200,000,000. Now, while I do not condemn the present banking system, and while I would advise the preservation of the utmost good faith to those institutions that have been created, I would not extend it. My objection to enlarging it arises chiefly from the fact that we are required to pay fifteen to eighteen millions of dollars a year in gold to them for the privilege of using $300,000,000 of their paper money. Why not use that amount of greenbacks for the same purpose, and thereby save to the Government these fifteen to eighteen millions which are now paid out of the national Treasury to the banks?

GREENBACKS ONLY FOR CIRCULATION.

I would have banks; we cannot get along without them; but I would not allow them to issue a dollar for circulation. All the circulation required by the wants of the country should be furnished by the Government, and to be continued so long as the Government debt exists. If the people are willing to use greenbacks as a currency, and by so doing the Government saves some fifty or sixty millions in interest annually, who is so simple, so profligate, so criminally negligent of his duties to the Government as to counsel against the economy, more especially at a time when our debt is heaviest and the taxes are required to be most onerous?

Suppose, when our five per cent. bonds shall have been substituted for those bearing higher rates of interest, and the banks shall accede to the proposition, we remodel the whole system, putting the capital at say $500,000,000, and distribute them equally over the entire country as far as practicable, the banks to deposit with the authorities at Washington five per cent. bonds to the amount of their capital and receive upon such pledge an equal amount in greenbacks for circulation, with the privilege of charging interest upon loans not exceeding one per cent. a month, and to be free from all other taxes or charges whatever by the General Government, while their bonds in pledge are to remain without interest. The privilege of charging the increased rate of interest will be a full compensation for the loss of interest on their deposited bonds and leave the trade for the use of money to an open market, where the lender and borrower are acting conformably to law, which will have a healthy influence upon the rate of interest and tend to bring it down. As it is, large interest is constantly exacted and paid because the trade is contraband, and is always carried on by an indirect routine to avoid open exposure, or upon such terms of peril to the banker that he charges for the risk he incurs by violating the law.

BANK PROFITS.

By this new order of things bank profits will be sufficiently remunerative in a country where money men ought to be satisfied with reasonable gains. Time was when bankers were satisfied with five per cent. semi-annual dividends. This will give more; and what is worthy of consideration with bankers and people, it will be banking with a currency on which no panics can make a run for redemption or specie payments. Banks can loan to the utmost dollar of their capital with as much of their deposits as is now done with safety, and the bills they circulate are their own pledges for redemption—they belong to the Government, and have the stamps of the nation for their value, as emphatic as when put upon coin, and are in form and in fact money, money at all times, in all places, and for all purposes.

THE PUBLIC DEBT BY THIS PLAN.

Let us now see how our finances will stand, June 30, 1867, if this plan could be adopted. Our total debt is supposed then to be $2,471,979,150. Take from it the following items not bearing interest:

Greenbacks now issued.....	$390,195,980
Greenbacks to be issued.....	$69,804,020
Fractional currency.....	27,588,010
Gold certificates.....	10,896,980
Total.....	$1,038,484,990

This sum subtracted from the total debt leaves $1,433,494,160, which at five per cent. the interest will amount annually to $71,674,708. The Secretary estimates the interest in his plan at $133,678,243, showing a saving in interest annually by my plan of over $62,000,000; so that at the close of that year, instead of having a surplus of $86,500,000 to apply to the payment of the principal of the debt, as by the Secretary's estimate, we should have a surplus of over $148,500,000. This would leave it in the power of Congress to liquidate the debt rapidly, if that should be deemed expedient, without increasing the taxes upon the people, and at the same time give them a currency sufficient for all the demands of trade, a currency not greater in quantity than England furnishes her people; a currency eleven dollars a head less than France provides for the wants of its people; a currency as reliable as our Government, and which, after years of trial, has secured and will retain the confidence of the country. If the authorities that issue it will cease to denounce it, but rather yield it the just commendation it deserves, it will soon approach the specie standard so closely that they will not materially differ in value.

DEBT PAID RAPIDLY AND TAX REDUCED.

It will substantially reduce our public debt so rapidly that it will no longer appear insurmountable, but inspire fresh hope in the people and increased confidence at home and abroad of our ability to pay every dollar, without ruining our citizens by taxation or pressing for loans in foreign countries.

I venture to assert that by the adoption of the plan proposed the customs alone will meet the accruing interest and leave a surplus of five or six millions monthly, to be applied in the redemption of the principal debt—a more rapid process of extinguishing it than the Secretary proposes, while he adds to the burden of taxation some seventy-four millions a year—leaving the ordinary expenses of the Government to be met by internal revenue, requiring, as by the Secretary's estimate, about two hundred and seventeen millions a year. The receipts into the Treasury for the past year exclusive of customs were:

Receipts from lands.....	$665,031
Receipts from direct tax.....	1,974,754
Receipts from internal revenue.....	309,226,813
Receipts from miscellaneous sources.....	67,119,369
Total.....	$378,985,967

Here we have a sum larger by $160,000,000 than is needed for the expenses of Government, leaving that amount to be taken from the present burden of taxation, the effect of which would be that by a proper adjustment of the taxes all the hardships now imposed upon the producing classes could be removed, and only such objects taxed as would afford the greatest amount of revenue and not seriously burden the productive interest of the country.

The estimated expenses of the Government for 1868 are set down $216,500,000. In this is included $64,000,000 for extra bounty, which ought not to be counted as current expense of civil Government. Deduct it and we have $152,500,000 to provide for by internal revenue in some form or other. That revenue can be raised by the present tax on whisky and cotton and have a surplus left of over $7,000,000. The whisky manufactured annually is estimated at forty million gallons; the tax of two dollars per gallon makes $80,000,000. Four million bales of cotton at the present tax would raise *Three hundred million dollars of this to be issued in the place of that amount of national bank circulation to be withdrawn.

$80,000,000, making $160,000,000 raised from those two articles alone.

But suppose it impossible to reach these figures by reason of frauds in the collection of the whisky tax and short cotton crops; making all reasonable deductions for these contingencies, I submit the following:

Revenue from whisky.....	$60,000,000
Revenue from cotton.....	40,000,000
Revenue from tobacco.....	18,000,000
Revenue from fermented liquors.....	5,000,000
Revenue from license.....	15,000,000
Revenue from stamps.....	20,000,000
Revenue from salaries.....	2,000,000
Total.....	160,000,000
Expense.....	152,500,000
Balance over expenses.....	$7,500,000

Thus we have an excess of revenue of $7,500,000 over all the ordinary expenses of Government, and no internal tax whatever upon the industry of the country to annoy or oppress the people. I do not say that other items may not be properly added to the sources of revenue, my object being to demonstrate, by this exhibit, that there is a way to relieve the people from the burden of taxation and not disturb the credit of the Government or deprive it of the means of usefulness to the fullest extent possible.

PUBLIC DEBT—INTEREST AND PRINCIPAL.

The money derived from customs being in coin, after meeting the interest punctually as it falls due, the residue should be applied by the Secretary of the Treasury, by some well-devised plan, to the purchase in open market monthly of five or six millions of the public debt, or so much thereof as the receipts of customs may justify. By this process, the interest being punctually paid in coin, and a continued market for bonds occurring every month, it cannot be doubted that our five per cents. would become popular stocks in the country; so much so that it might even be practicable, in due time, to supersede them with others bearing a less interest. All depends upon public confidence. It could scarcely be attainable if one half of our people make war upon the bonds and insist upon taxing them out of credit, and the chief officers of the Government denounce our currency as unconstitutional and irredeemable, and the Congress that authorized them as an illegal body, hanging upon the verge of the Government, without competent authority to make any law to protect the people or bind the nation. We must have fidelity to the country in high places if we expect to prosper by the wisest measures that may be devised; men who can rise above the mere partisan, and whose devotion to their country is not overcome by their lust of power.

FINANCIAL CONDITION OF THE COUNTRY.

Mr. KUYKENDALL. Mr. Speaker, the bill which I introduced on the 7th of January, 1867, entitled "An act to provide a true national currency and to provide for the collection and disbursement of the revenue, and the liquidation of the national debt, and for other purposes," as will be seen by the title, relates to one of the most important subjects of legislation, a subject which has engaged the attention of our most profound statesmen from the earliest history of our Government, and has been more or less prominent before every Congress that has convened since the establishment of the Government, and which to-day is as much an open question as when first introduced into the Halls of legislation. Hardly a day passes without the introduction of some measure looking to a change in our monetary laws, or for the establishment of a new monetary system, indicating the universal opinion that the present system is imperfect, if not radically wrong. The latter I hold to be true, and the bill which I introduced contemplates a thorough change in the financial policy of the Government, as well as important alterations in our revenue system.

Among the chief objects for which Governments are instituted is that of protecting the rights of property and securing its equitable distribution according to the labor or service performed in its production. And no Government, whether republican or not, that fails to effect these important ends can permanently secure the prosperity and happiness of the people.

It cannot be successfully denied that physical and intellectual labor employed in production, and in the distribution of the products of labor, is the true and only source of national wealth, and that laborers, as a whole, are poor. Look where you will upon society you will see those who build palatial residences living in hovels; those who manufacture the finest apparel clothed in the coarsest fabrics; and those who produce in abundance the most wholesome and delicate food subsisting upon the poorest diet; all deprived of the time and means necessary for social and intellectual culture, and to a great degree destitute of the ordinary comforts and conveniences of life—condemned to lives of unremunerated toil; while another class, few in number, not physically, intellectually, or morally better than the average of society, acquire the larger portion of the products of labor, live in comparative idleness, surrounded with all the comforts, conveniences, and luxuries of life. Besides this evil of centralizing wealth in the possession of the few, every few years our country is visited with a monetary crisis, prostrating all branches of productive industry and legitimate enterprise, deranging commercial operations, retarding the development of our natural resources, preventing us from becoming self-sustaining and independent as a nation. This disparity in the conditions of society, these monetary crises and commercial disasters are at one time attributed to overproduction, another time to short production; again they are assigned to the want of sufficient tariff on imports or duties on foreign manufactures. We have greatly increased production by the invention of labor-saving machines, have raised and lowered tariffs without producing any permanent beneficial effects, unless it be the building up a cotton-mill or iron aristocracy. The wealth continues to centralize in fewer hands; the number of industrious poor who own no real and little personal property continues to increase. None of the causes assigned have ever satisfactorily accounted for these wrongs or pointed to a remedy, because they do not reach the true source of the evil, which will be found in the unfair distribution of the products of labor between non-producing capital and producing labor caused by the institution of money on a wrong principle, and with too great power over labor and property.

Money is the medium of distribution between non-producing capital and labor; the rate of interest determining what proportion of the products of labor shall be awarded to capital for its use, and what to labor for its productions; and the law instituting it is the most important fundamental law in any nation; if established upon a wrong basis it cannot be rightly governed by subsequent laws.

I am aware that this measure, or any one proposing such a thorough change in the monetary system and financial policy of the Government, will meet with opposition; first from the prejudices that exist generally in the human mind against changes in the systems and usages to which they have been long accustomed; but these prejudices where honestly entertained will readily yield to conviction. Yet it will meet with opposition of another and different character, one having its root in avarice, founded on the personal and pecuniary interests of soulless usurers, the corporations and monopolies which have been fostered into gigantic proportions, endowed with dangerous powers over the property and liberties of men by the fraudulent monetary system, the overthrow of which the bill contemplates. I have no hope that this interest will yield to any arguments I may offer, or indeed to any that can be offered; it has a death grasp upon the nation, which, like the institution of slavery, it will not yield until utterly destroyed. But relying upon the ultimate triumph of truth, this nor any other opposition shall deter me from the discharge of what I hold to be a sacred duty which I owe to my immediate constituents as well as to the American people generally, that of warning them of impending danger by pointing to the path of safety.

The bill provides for the reorganization of the Treasury Department of the United States by the establishment of a "Board of Management of the Currency and Revenue," consisting of the Secretary of the Treasury and four other members, who, in all matters relating to the currency and revenue, are to have an equal voice with the Secretary of the Treasury. The objects sought to be secured by this plan are: first, a more thorough supervision and personal inspection of the detail of the business belonging to this important branch of the public service, by competent and responsible officers than can possibly be given to it by any individual, however talented and capable he may be. Admitting that a single individual may have been able to discharge these important duties before the war, when the revenues were derived mainly from custom duties and the sale of the public domain, and when the Department was not charged with the duties of providing the currency, I think it will not be doubted that the war has increased the duties and responsibilities of the Department at least fourfold, and that they are too onerous to be discharged by any individual without detriment to the public interest.

Greater uniformity in the financial policy of the Government would be attained under the proposed system; there would always be three experienced members in the board, which would constitute a majority and prevent any sudden change in case of a change in the political sentiments of the Administration. This would give confidence to the business community.

Our country has become so extended and our interests so varied that it is impossible that any man or any set of men residing in one locality can have a full and clear knowledge of the business of all the other localities. In order to obviate this difficulty, and that all sections and interests may be fairly represented in the board, the bill provides for choosing the members by districts.

The bill contemplates the abolishment of all banks, State and national. It could therefore hardly be expected that any one who favors the continuance of that system of currency, or who is interested in those institutions, could so far control his prejudices and interests as to give the proposed plan a fair trial. Besides, this class of the community have controlled the financial policy of the Government and the currency of the nation for the past thirty years; and there is in the minds of the people very generally an idea that they have conducted them with an eye single to their own aggrandizement, without regard to the interests of the industrial classes. I have therefore thought it the wisest policy to exclude from the Board of Management of the Currency and Revenue all stockholders and bank officers.

As money exercises a wonderful power in every department of business and industrial occupation, and as its nature and regulation appear to have baffled the wisdom of political economists, and led them to the conclusion that its alternate abundance and scarcity and the fluctuating rates of interest are irremediable evils, a full and clear knowledge of its nature and properties, the functions it performs in business transactions, is an indispensable prerequisite in order to its institution upon true principles. Money is, then, the legal medium for the exchange of property and products, the legal-tender in the payment of all debts public and private, and a legal lien on all the property in the nation. To be fitted for the performance of these functions, it must be endowed with the following properties or powers, to wit: power to represent value, to measure value, to exchange value, and to accumulate value by interest.

These properties or powers are inherent in no natural substance, and must be conferred on the material used for money by national law. Money has no material value; only an immaterial or legal value.

The material of money, gold, silver, paper, or any other substance, is a legalized agent made to express the form, properties, or powers of money and render them available in business transactions. Common usage has applied the term measure to the material by the means of which length, weight, &c., are ascertained. It matters not whether the yard-stick or pound weight be of wood, iron, or gold, length and weight are the only properties necessary to be expressed by them, and possessing the standard limits, their material is a matter of indifference. Of course some material is indispensable; but the only thing that makes one substance preferable to another is its superior convenience. So of money; it is a matter of indifference by what material the powers are expressed, for the material is merely a substance fixed upon by law; the natural powers of any material do not make it money. Its powers and agency, as money, are delegated to it by law, in addition to its natural capabilities. When gold is used, the powers conferred upon it make it an equivalent for every species of property. If gold had not been selected for the material of money, and a legal power given to it to exchange property and to accumulate interest for its use, a man would have as little need for more gold than he requires for utensils and ornaments, as he has for more clothes than he can wear, or more tools than he can use. But when it is made the agent of these legal powers, it becomes necessary to acquire the gold in order to discharge debts; and the quantity of the metal being limited its owners are enabled to extort from the necessitous a very high price for its use. The common opinion that the material of a currency must be something scarce and difficult to procure, that the limited amount may render it permanently valuable, arises from a misconception of the nature of money, the properties of which are entirely independent of the material. The value of money depends upon its powers to represent, measure, accumulate, and exchange value.

These powers given to any convenient material by congressional enactment will qualify it for a medium of exchange, and in every particular constitute it money. The power to make money and regulate its value is an essential attribute of sovereignty, carrying with it the power to control the value of all the property in the nation, regulate the division of the products between capital and labor, and fix the rewards of labor in every department of industry. While this power has been wisely and properly granted to Congress, there is no more authority granted to that body by the Constitution of the United States to delegate this sovereign power to any class of individuals or corporations than there is for the delegation of the judicial power. It is, therefore, the imperative duty of Congress to institute money upon such a wise and just basis that its value and powers may be uniform throughout the jurisdiction of the Government; and with the power vested in the sovereign people to regulate its value so that it may distribute products to producers according to the labor and service performed in their production.

Time will not permit me, on this occasion, to treat in detail the general nature and properties of money as fully as the importance of the subject demands, and I shall therefore confine myself to a few brief remarks on its accumulative power, and then proceed to show that the rate of interest is the governing power in the distribution between capital and labor, and that the present rates greatly exceed the increase by natural production. The rate or amount of interest that the dollar commands determines its value and makes it equal to a given amount of actual value, or property, as much as the net proceeds of a farm determines its value—which consists in its value to produce. The value of the money is artificial, and depends on its legal power to represent actual value and to accumulate by interest. A farm that produces a net annual income of $1,000 is more valuable than one that yields but $500; so a dollar that can be loaned for twelve per cent. is more valuable than one that can be loaned for but six per cent. The value of money as much depends upon its legal power to be loaned for an income as the value of a farm does upon its power to produce. Any increase or diminution of the power of money to accumulate by interest increases or diminishes proportionately its value, and consequently its power over labor and property. To keep the value of money uniform, the rate of interest must be kept uniform. Doubling the power of the dollar to accumulate doubles the value of the dollar. It may still retain the name of dollar, but it will possess twice its former power over property and labor.

It may be objected that, while what has been said of money is true, so far as our home business is concerned, yet the adoption of such a monetary system would operate injuriously upon our foreign trade; that as all commercial nations have legalized the so-called precious metals as money we cannot maintain commercial relations with them unless we also legalize them as money. A sufficient answer to this objection is, that our coin is not current or legal money, at the standard fixed by our laws, in any foreign nation. They only receive it at the standard fixed by their laws, and greatly prefer our bullion to our coin. Besides, legitimate commerce is the exchange of the products of the territory and labor of one nation for those of another. All beyond mere barter is a matter of debt, and if we imported $300,000,000 (that being about the amount of our coinage) in excess of the exports of our production, we would have to part with all our coin, which would derange the entire industrial interests of the nation. Again, if we did not use these metals for a circulating medium, we would have more of them to ship abroad as bullion to settle balances or to exchange for articles of real value. We could take up $300,000,000 of our national bonds now held abroad, and thereby save $18,000,000 of interest annually, which would be a great relief to a people overburdened with taxes.

The advocates of a specie currency argue that the so-called precious metals require about an equal amount of labor for their production the world over, and therefore they are the true measures of all values; that it is the labor incorporated into them that gives them their value as money. If this be true of these metals, it should be true of all the productions of labor. If A produces, by one hundred days' mining, gold to the value of $200, the Government will stamp it as money for him; and if B produces, by one hundred days' labor, two hundred bushels of wheat, which the Government purchases of him for $200, and he is willing to take a piece of paper stamped as money by the Government "$200," there can surely be no valid objection against the Government doing so. It would represent the same amount of labor; and if it had the same legal powers as the gold it would perform all the functions of money equally as well, coextensive with the jurisdiction of the law. We have a practical illustration of this in the first series of Treasury notes issued, which was $50,000,000, payable in coin on demand. These notes passed at par with coin until the banks and the Government suspended specie payments, when they began to depreciate in value, as compared with coin, and continued to decline until they were made receivable for duties on foreign imports, or in other words, were made legally equal to coin, when they immediately rose to par, and have remained so ever since. Or if D be the holder of a bond for $1,000, which he wishes to convert into money, and is willing to exchange it for a legal-tender Treasury note, it is difficult to conceive of any valid reason why the Government should not make the exchange, rather than to subject him to heavy discount, for the benefit of some banker.

This erroneous idea that the value of money inheres in its material, and that gold and silver possess some indefinable property or qualification that fits them above all other substances for the material of money is at the bottom of the false theories respecting the nature of money and its rightful institution. It is the cause of its alternate abundance and scarcity, of the high and fluctuating rates of interest, and has led to the adoption of the many false systems of banking by which the legitimate business of the country has been so often deranged and the industrial, wealth-producing classes robbed of the products of their labor. And while this mistaken notion is entertained by the people and their law-makers these evils must continue. But when the nature and properties of money are clearly understood, and there is a willingness on the part of all to be governed by the precepts of the golden rule, the chief difficulty in the way of its institution on true principles will be removed; and its institution on correct principles will do more to lift the weight from the back of the industrial classes, and encourage the development of our resources than all the bankrupt and tariff laws that have been enacted since the formation of the Government.

I come now to show that the rate of interest on money is the governing power in the distribution of the products of labor between non-producing capital and producing labor. There are but two purposes to which the yearly products of labor can be applied. One is the payment of the yearly rent or interest on the capital employed, and the other is the payment of labor. The rate of interest maintained on loans of money determines what proportion of the earnings of labor shall be paid for the use of capital, and what proportion shall be paid to the laborers for their productions. If laborers pay to capital as rent or interest for the year their whole surplus products, the laborers as a body work for a mere subsistence of food, clothing, and shelter. To give an idea to what extent the power of interest operates it is only necessary to say that all the money lent on bonds and mortgages by individuals, by insurance and trust companies, all lent for United States, State, county, city, railroad, canal, and other bonds, to make public improvements, whether these improvements be made by corporations, by the State, or by individuals, also all the money lent by banks, brokers, and individuals on promissory notes—all these loans are operating with a like centralizing power against the producer and distributors of the national wealth and in favor of the money-lenders.

This power also establishes a like rate per cent. rent to be paid for the use of all property, real and personal. All the goods on hand in the nation, and in process of being manufactured, are under tribute to this centralizing power. It is an unavoidable power, because it is instituted and enforced by the national laws, and is the basis upon which all market values are founded. It may be proper to remark in this connection that in the calculations that follow I have compounded the interest annually, which is the national law governing increase by percentage. The lowest rate of interest upon money established by any State is six per cent. per annum, and the rate has fluctuated between six and twenty per cent. since the formation of the Government. If we take into the account the rates authorized on the bonds of the United States, States, &c., and the price at which these bonds have been sold and the exorbitant rates in many cases charged in business transactions, I think it will not be doubted that the rate has averaged as much as ten per cent. per annum since the earliest settlement of the country.

To get a clear idea of the accumulative power of money and its influence in the distribution of the wealth of the nation we must take the longest possible period in our history. The first permanent settlement on our territory was made at Jamestown, in Virginia, in 1607, or two hundred and sixty years ago; now, if these settlers had purchased of the mother country the entire territory of the United States for one dollar, and given their obligations bearing ten per cent. interest, payable two hundred and sixty years after date, their obligations would fall due the present year, and I doubt not it would be considered by many to have been a good financial operation, and all that would be necessary to discharge this obligation would be for the Secretary of the Treasury to part with a portion of the gold now lying idle in the Treasury, or to make a draft for the money deposited with the national banks. But the result will, I think, convince the most strenuous advocate for high rates of interest that no nation or people can pay ten per cent. without robbing labor and centralizing the wealth in the hands of the very few. This one dollar with interest at ten per cent. compounded annually for two hundred and sixty years, will amount to $59,650,000,000, or over three times the present value of all the property real and personal of the United States.

There are in the United States at the present time about seven million two hundred thousand male inhabitants over the age of twenty years, and allowing each of them to work three hundred days in the year, the number of days' work performed annually would be two billion one hundred and sixty million. To pay the annual interest on the above sum would require $2 76 for each day's labor performed in the nation. Now, let us see what the result would have been with the honest and well-regulated dollar; with money so instituted as to be the servant and not the master of labor. Had the obligations for the payment of the one dollar been made to bear three per cent. per annum, the amount would be $2,180. But it may be objected that the resources of the country were not developed as rapidly during her colonial condition as since the establishment of her independence, and that the per cent. is above the average rate of interest. I will therefore compare the increase in the national wealth by natural production with the accumulative power of money at seven per cent. interest since the Declaration of Independence.

There are in the thirteen original colonies or States three hundred and forty-seven thousand square miles, or two billion ninety-five million seven hundred and sixty thousand acres, which I will suppose our ancestors to have purchased in 1776 at fifty cents per acre; including improvements and personal property, the amount would have been $1,047,888,000. This would have been but little over $250 per capita, which I think will not be considered an overestimate of the then value of the property of the nation; for allowing it to have increased at the rate of increase during the decade from 1850 to 1860, which was three and one third per cent. per annum, the amount on the 4th of July, 1867, would, in round numbers, be $20,723,320,000, which is a little in excess of the present value of the national wealth; which is, in round numbers, $20,330,000,000. Now, had the then estimated value of the wealth of the nation, $1,047,880,000, increased at the rate of seven per cent. per annum for the same time, the amount would, in round numbers, be $506,100,000,000, or nearly twenty-five times the value of the national wealth on 4th of July, 1867, including the Territories since acquired.

Again, to present this subject in still stronger light, I will estimate the revolutionary war to have cost the nation $362,120,000, which I think all will admit a very moderate estimate: suppose our ancestors at the time of the Declaration of Independence to have purchased the country of England for this sum, and given their obligations, bearing seven per cent. interest, payable ninety-one years after date, with interest compounded annually; this I doubt not would be considered to have been a good financial operation; and so it would if money were worth seven per cent. per annum, or the increase in the national wealth had equaled seven per cent. per annum. Such a negotiation would have saved the cost of the revolutionary war. I will therefore add it to the then estimated value of the national wealth, which would make the value of the national wealth at that time $1,400,000,000. Had this sum increased at the rate of three and one third per cent. per annum the amount would be $27,683,000,000, while the increase on the $362,120,000 for the same time at seven per cent. would be $174,930,000,000, or over six times the amount of what the entire national wealth would have been, and over eight times the amount of the present value of the national wealth.

There is a class of financiers, claiming to be honest and intelligent, who argue that money is worth more in new and undeveloped than in old and improved countries. I have heard hundreds of them contend that it was worth ten per cent. in the State of Illinois. For the benefit of this class I will exhibit the following facts: I will take the State of Illinois, which contains fifty-five thousand square miles, or thirty-five million two hundred thousand acres, and which, considering fertility of soil, mineral wealth, commercial advantages, and variety and salubrity of climate, I think is not surpassed by any other contiguous territory of equal extent on this continent or elsewhere. I think it quite safe to assume that the rate of interest on money there has averaged ten per cent. per annum since the first settlement of the territory, which I will assume was on the 4th of July, 1816, or fifty-one years ago. Now, had the present settlers or their ancestors purchased the entire territory of the State at the Government price of $1 25 per acre, and given their notes or obligations therefor, bearing ten per cent. interest per annum, these obligations would fall due the present year, and would amount to the enormous sum of $5,718,044,444, or $162 44 per acre for each and every acre of land within the limits of the State. The interest on the total sum for one year would be $571,804,444; to pay the interest would require an annual rental of $16 24 per acre on all the lands in the State, or probably as much as thirty dollars per acre for that portion under cultivation, while the value of the State as per census of 1860 was but $871,860,280. If you double this amount it will not amount to one third of the accumulations of the interest on the purchase at $1 25 per acre. There is not one of my colleagues that does not know that the lands, with all the cities, towns, railroads, and other improvements, would not sell for half the amount of the accumulations by interest on the first purchases; this, too, notwithstanding that population and wealth has poured into the State beyond any parallel.

Kellogg, who has given this subject of the accumulative power of money and the distribution of money as much attention and treated it more ably than any man of the age, says that before the war as much as one half of all the wealth of the nation was owned by five per cent. of the population, and these for the most part the non-producers, who loaned their money or rented their property to the wealth-producing classes. The effect of the war has been to diminish production, increase the rate of interest on money, and to centralize the wealth more rapidly. I therefore think it quite safe to estimate that as much as sixty per cent. of the wealth is now owned by five per cent. of the population. If any one doubts this let him take any city or town the population of which is ten thousand and see if he cannot find one hundred of the most wealthy citizens who own at least sixty per cent. of the property, and allowing five to the family this would make five hundred, which is five per cent. on ten thousand. Taking the national wealth at $20,000,000,000, it would give to the non-producing class $12,000,000,000 of the national wealth, which they loan or rent to the industrial classes, and the rate of interest will average at least eight per cent. per annum, making the yearly burden imposed upon labor $960,000,000, while the increase on $20,000,000,000 of national wealth at three and one third per cent. per annum will amount to but $667,000,000, leaving the wealth-producing classes indebted to capital or the non-producers $293,000,000 at the end of the year.

But the question naturally arises how we are to ascertain the just rate of interest on money. Happily we are not without sufficiently reliable data to approximate the true rate nearly enough for all practical purposes. Agriculture is the leading interest and foundation of the national wealth; and the increase in this important branch of industry may be taken as the true index in all other departments; and the division between landlord and tenant may be safely adopted as the rule of distribution between capital and labor in all other branches of productive industry. And I find, by careful examination and critical analysis, that during the decade from 1850 to 1860, which was as prosperous a one as we have had since the establishment of the Government, the increase in improved lands and unimproved lands was forty per cent.; the increase in wheat, rye, corn, and oats, forty-four per cent.; and the increase in all kinds of live stock, thirty-four per cent. Taking, then, the increase in lands, all kinds of grain and live stock, the total increase in these staple productions of agriculture for the last ten years was thirty-nine per cent., or three and one third per cent. per annum nearly; and a renter cannot afford to pay over one third of the net proceeds and keep up all repair of a good and well-improved farm. If, then, the division of products between capital and labor in the most important branch of productive industry be adopted as the standard of distribution between capital and labor in all other departments of useful industry, it will be seen that the true rate of interest on money should be but one and one ninth per cent. per annum. Now, let us see how the account would stand between labor and capital with the rate of interest on money at one and one ninth per cent. per annum. Twelve billion dollars at this rate would be $138,000,000, while the increase on $20,000,000,000 of national wealth at three and one third per cent. would be $666,000,000, leaving a balance in favor of the wealth-producing classes at the end of the year of $533,000,000; with interest at two and a half per cent., the balance in favor of the industrial classes at the end of the year would be $366,000,000; and with interest at three per cent. the balance in favor of the laborer would be $306,000,000 annually—a result in either case more encouraging to the industrial wealth-producing classes, and one very much more to be desired by all patriots, philanthropists, and Christians, than the former one, which will leave labor indebted to non-producing capital $293,000,000 annually.

I come next to consider the fitness or rather the unfitness of the present monetary and revenue systems and the financial policy to meet the wants of the Government and business interests of the country. Time on this occasion will not permit me to examine in detail the laws creating the so-called national banks and establishing the revenue system, and I must content myself with the notice of only a few of their most important provisions, which will serve to indicate their general character and show that they are calculated to promote the interest of non-producing capital and to impose unnecessary and grievous burdens on the enterprising industrial classes.

We have contracted an enormous national debt, one more onerous than that of any civilized or Christian nation on the globe. The annual interest on the national debt of Great Britain is but $121,000,000. When the patriotic bankers and financiers get the "greenbacks" withdrawn from circulation, and the whole national debt converted into gold interest-bearing bonds, and we add to the national debt proper that of townships, counties, cities, and States, contracted for war purposes, our annual interest will amount to at least $240,000,000 in the money of trade. Every dollar of this debt, interest as well as principal, must be paid by the labor of the nation. It makes no difference whether it is collected from duties on foreign imports, excise on whisky, tobacco, and other luxuries. I care not how cunningly taxes may be laid, the burden must, as surely as death will come to all the living, in the end all be borne by labor. It is therefore the interest, nay the imperative duty of every Christian, philanthropist, patriot, and lover of justice, as well as of the entire industrial classes, to see that these burdens are made as light as possible and equally distributed on all classes and interests.

The first question that arises is: will the financial policy adopted and being pursued by the Government lead to these results? I think a thorough investigation and careful examination of the subject will convince any intelligent, impartial mind that it will not. The reasons upon which this opinion is founded are as follows: the same parties who have controlled the money interests of the nation in the past are to conduct it in the future, and by means somewhat similar, to wit: a bank currency purporting to be redeemable in money. Under the former system this currency was issued under the authority of the several States; sectional interests and jealousies prevented a consolidation and lessened the power of the bankers for mischief. The currency issued by these institutions was never any better apology for money than falsehood for truth. The necessity for money to conduct business operations, and the absence of anything better, compelled the people to accept their notes in exchange for their property and products, which gave the bankers the control of the moneyed interest of the whole country, with power to regulate the value of all the property in the nation and fix the rewards of labor in every department of industry; and they wielded this power with an eye single to their own benefit. They expanded and contracted the currency, raised and lowered the rate of interest, encouraged or prostrated all legitimate enterprise and productive industry, set the laws at defiance, and suspended and resumed specie payments at pleasure, and in every possible way made the public interest subservient to their cupidity.

The so-called national banking system is founded on the same principle, with greatly multiplied powers for mischief. A change of base, while the principle remains the same, can at best be but the exchange of one evil for another. To get a clear understanding of the practical workings of this system and its powers for oppressing the wealth-producing classes we must consider it in connection with the laws authorizing the national loans and establishing the revenue system, for they are inseparably connected. Time on this occasion will not permit a general review of those laws, and I will therefore confine myself to the consideration of a few of their most important provisions, which I think will serve to show that they are founded on a wrong principle and inimical to and subversive of the principles of freedom and equality upon which our democratic institutions are founded, and must work great injustice to the wealth-producing classes.

The law enacting the national banking system clothes the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States with unprecedented and dangerous power; his control over the Bureau of the Currency is absolute, without check or restraint from any other department of the Government. Indeed, so far as the interest of the people is concerned, with but few and unimportant exceptions, these unrestricted powers prevail throughout the whole law. Thus the whole moneyed interest of the nation is under the control of a single man; the banks are only the medium through which this centralized power operates. And when these despotic powers (for such they surely are) are wielded by one whose life has been devoted, not to encouraging the development of the national resources by aiding honest industry and fostering legitimate enterprise, but to sacrificing public and private interests and filching from honest toil the last farthing when necessary to pay large dividends to the stockholders in the banks with which he may have been connected or over which he may have been called to preside. This is the character of the man these bankers will insist shall fill the office of Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, and they will permit no other character to occupy that place for any length of time, for through Congress they have the power to remove him; and should this system be continued we will not have many elections before a majority of that body will be stockholders in these banks, if indeed that be not the case already. I venture the prediction that if you should interrogate the Secretary as to the wisdom and justice of his plan, he would tell you it was the wisest and best that could possibly be devised, for he had consulted with the leading bankers and most intelligent business men of Wall street, New York, Third street, Philadelphia, and State street, Boston, by all of whom it was most heartily approved, and well it might be; because if you could go back and get at the paternity of the measure you would find it originated with them, was presented by them to the Secretary for his approval, and not by the Secretary to them for their indorsement.

This is the history of every financial measure adopted by the Government since the commencement of the rebellion, excepting alone the issue of the legal-tender Treasury notes, and this was the measure that sustained the credit of the Government and carried us through the darkest hours of our troubles, and which was opposed by these bankers and intelligent business men at every step, and which they now demand shall be blotted from our statutes. It is entirely unnecessary for me to say anything in this connection in relation to the business and interest of the bankers; these are understood by all; but a word in reference to the business and interests of these intelligent business men, of whose wisdom and patriotism newspapers have so much to say, and who have so much influence in molding the financial legislation of the Government, may not be amiss; for it would be very natural to suppose that they were the energetic, enterprising portion of our business community, who are engaged in the development of our resources; but not a bit of it. They are the speculators in stocks, food, clothing, and all the products of labor, standing between the producers and consumers—amassing fortunes by a species of the very worst kind of gambling; and while they are permitted to exercise such a powerful influence over the financial policy of the Government as they now do, we can be nothing but a nation of gamblers; useful enterprise cannot be undertaken, nor can the legitimate commercial operations of the nation be conducted other than as gambling operations. These banks are authorized to be located in every city and village throughout the length and breadth of the land, forming a complete system of financial espionage. Under the revenue system they will have their thousands of agents in every part of the country, clothed with authority to pry into the affairs of each individual. I say their agents, because they will control the Government, and no officer or agent of the Government who is not in the interest and the willing tool of this moneyed aristocracy can hold any office or place under the Government. Through these means they will have a full knowledge of the business of every miner, farmer, mechanic, merchant, manufacturer, railroad company, and other enterprises in the nation. This will enable them to operate understandingly; and with their unrestricted power over the currency of the nation they can make every other interest, however great, subservient to their cupidity, and tax the industrial classes until they become as helpless as the fly in the spider's web—tax their manhood out of them.

Their circulation is to be apportioned among the States and Territories by the Secretary of the Treasury, having due regard to the existing banking capital, resources, and business of such States and Territories. The effect of this will be to give a few of the eastern cities and villages the control of the currency of the nation, they having a major part of the existing banking capital. The law provides that three fifths of the amount, to be kept on hand in lawful money to redeem their circulation, may consist of clearing-house certificates and balances due from other associations. The effect of this will be to require the banks in our large cities to keep on hand but ten cents, and those located in all other places but six cents on the dollar in lawful money for the redemption of their circulation, or an average of about eight per cent. It would be quite natural to conclude that the banks gave the Government some valuable considerations for the grant of those sovereign principles and powers, but they do not. They are to have the use of the public money (except receipts from customs) for banking purposes. They draw the interest in gold on the bonds deposited to secure the redemption of their circulating notes, and receive ninety per cent. of the value of the bonds so deposited, which they loan to the people at from seven to ten per cent.; and to reimburse the Treasury for printing their notes and all other expenses incurred under the law, and in lieu of all taxes on their circulation and the bonds deposited to secure the redemption thereof, they are required to pay into the national Treasury only one half of one per cent. semi-annually, which will not probably more than defray the expenses incurred by the Government under the law. Thus, instead of the bankers paying a liberal bonus to the Government for these unheard-of privileges and powers, as claimed by the bankers and their allies, the law virtually exonerates them from taxation. Let us now look at the profits these bankers derive from this system. To put in circulation $300,000,000 currency will require the deposit of $333,333,333 in bonds, on which they draw six per cent. in gold, equal to at least eight and one half per cent. in the money of trade, but which, when we take into account the exemption from taxes, will equal full ten per cent. They have the $300,000,000 of currency received from the Government, which they loan to the people at an average of nine per cent. per annum; add to this the Government deposits, which they will loan to the people, and which I think will average as much as $100,000,000, from which must be deducted the interest on eight per cent. of their circulation, kept on hand for the redemption of their notes.

Interest on bonds deposited ($333,333,333) at 10 per cent.	$33,333,333
Interest on circulation ($300,000,000) at 9 per cent.	27,000,000
Interest on Government deposits ($100,000,000) at 9 per cent.	9,000,000
Total income.	69,333,333
Deduct interest on $24,000,000 kept on hand to redeem circulation at 9 per cent.	2,160,000

Net income.....$67,173,333 or a fraction over twenty per cent. per annum.

Another, and not the least mischievous and dangerous provision of this scheme is that it will be a close corporation. The only channel through which the people, who are compelled to exchange their labor, products, and property for these bank promises, can obtain any knowledge of the solvency of the different institutions issuing this currency is through the Secretary of the Treasury, for he has the sole power of choosing the time and appointing the agents to examine the association. When one of these institutions fails the Secretary of the Treasury will without doubt protect the interests of his friends, the bankers and intelligent business men, by giving them timely notice, and the Government and those engaged in legitimate business will become the victims of their villainies.

It is true that for the present the circulation of the banks is limited to $300,000,000; but, having secured these unwarranted powers and privileges, the bankers and usurers will either demand the withdrawal of the legal-tender

Treasury notes, which cost the people nothing, and an increase of their circulation, which really cost the tax-payers nine per cent. in the money of trade, or that the currency shall be contracted under the delusive plea of a return to specie payments. If the former policy be adopted, just as fast as the legal-tenders are withdrawn from circulation their place will be filled with the notes of the banks, and we shall soon have as much as $700,000,000 of the notes of the banks in circulation, from which the banks will derive an annual income of $156,700,000, while the interest at three per cent. per annum on the amount of capital necessary to put this amount of notes in circulation will only amount to $23,333,000, leaving to the bankers a net annual profit of $133,367,000, every dollar of which is an unnecessary and unjust burden imposed on the industrial wealth-producing class for the benefit of the bankers. The adoption of the latter policy would, if possible, be more unjust and oppressive to the industrial wealth-producing classes or tax-payers than the former in the present condition of the nation.

It must be remembered that the banks never have and never will, under any system, pay specie, unless by so doing they can promote their own selfish interest. Let us then look at the effects of an attempt to return to specie payments in the present condition of the country. It would increase the value of money or non-producing capital and augment its power over labor and property. Reducing prices by raising the rate of interest and increasing the power of money is simply robbing labor for the benefit of non-producing capital. If, by contracting the currency, the bushel of grain, yard of cloth, pair of boots, coat, hat, and all other productions of labor be reduced to one half their present price the price of labor must fall in a like proportion; while if the rate of interest on the Government bonds and other moneyed obligations, as well as bank dividends, remain unchanged the value of money will be doubled; for the interest and dividends, when earned and paid, will buy double the amount of the products of labor and hire twice the number of days' work. It will also practically double the pay of every assessor, tax-gatherer, postmaster, member of Congress, and other officer or agent of the national Government, as well as those of the States, counties, and cities, for their pay will buy double the amount of the products of labor. It will readily be seen that the practical effect of this policy will be to double the taxes as well as the obligations of every debtor in the nation, increase the value of all money obligations, and render all public offices more desirable.

It is not, then, at all surprising that brokers, bankers, bond-holders, and the non-producing classes generally should be the advocates for its adoption, or that there should be such otherwise unaccountable unanimity on the part of the leading journals (without regard to their political sentiment) in favor of it, for most of them are either directly or indirectly largely benefited by it; nor is it by any means wonderful that our law-makers and Government officers and agents should be susceptible to these potent influences. But it is a matter of astonishment that farmers, miners, artisans, mechanics, merchants, and all who are employed in any branch of useful industry or engaged in legitimate enterprise or any of the useful callings and professions, as well as patriots, philanthropists, and Christians, have so long silently permitted the enemies of freedom and justice to usurp the sovereign power to make money and regulate its value—one of the most essential attributes of sovereignty—by which they secure the power to control the value of all the property in the nation and fix the rewards of labor in every department of useful industry, to subvert the principles of justice and freedom upon which our noble temple of liberty was founded, to violate with impunity every right of humanity, and to reduce to a state of vassalage or slavery the whole enterprising, wealth-producing classes of the nation.

Having secured exemption from State and municipal taxes, they will next demand exemption from taxes on the incomes arising from bank dividends and interest on the Government bonds. They will then have a legalized money aristocracy. The farmers, mechanics, merchants, and wealth-producing classes generally might with equal justice ask that their property, products, and labor should be exempt from all taxes. But, should they make this demand, what a howl the bankers, brokers, usurers, and the professional politicians and sensation newspapers in the interest of this money aristocracy would raise! They would brand it as repudiation. And what is the exemption from taxes of your bonds, bearing bankrupting rates of interest, and your twenty per cent. bank dividends but legalized repudiation? These laws or schemes, taken together, give the one twentieth the power to rob the other nineteen twentieths of the surplus products of all their labor and talents; and any system that authorizes and empowers one class to take from another class the fruits of their labor and talents without equivalent is practical slavery. I care not what it is called. When you deprive a man of the right to the enjoyment of the fruits of his labor and talents, there is no other right which he can long maintain. The continual and pressing wants of his physical nature will soon reduce him to abject slavery; and what is true of the individual is true of the nation. I find in the "American Conflict," by Horace Greeley, Esq., the following extract from Roman history, which I think worthy of being repeated in this connection:

"The first man who ever imbibed the delusion that it was more advantageous for him or any human being to procure whatever his necessities or appetite required by address and scheming than by honest work, by the unrequited rather than the fairly and faithfully recompensed toil of his fellow-creatures, was in essence and at heart a slaveholder, and only awaited opportunity to become one in deed and practice. It is none the less true, however, that ancient civilization, in its various national developments, was habitually corrupted, debauched, and ultimately ruined by slavery, which divided society horizontally into a small caste of the wealthy, educated, refined, and independent, and a hungry, sensual, thriftless, and worthless populace, rendered impossible the preservation of republican liberty and civilized equality, even among the nominally free. Diogenes with his lantern might have vainly looked through many a long day among the followers of Marius or Cataline or Caesar for a specimen of the poor, but virtuous and self-respecting Roman citizens of the days of Cincinnatus or even of Regulus."

I am persuaded that a thorough investigation and a careful examination into all the provisions of these laws will convince any intelligent, disinterested mind that, under their operation, labor cannot be properly rewarded; that the well-to-do farmers, mechanics, merchants, and others will soon be reduced to the present status of common laborers, and those who now earn their bread by daily toil to a state of positive servitude. I assert, without fear of successful contradiction, that an investment of a $1,000,000 under these laws will yield a larger net income than a like amount invested in lands and slaves, employed in raising cotton or sugar, did in the South in the palmiest days of the oligarchy; and it was its commercial or economical value, in other words its profitability, that maintained the institution of slavery in the South. Thus, instead of materially bettering the condition of the poor African, we propose to nationalize slavery by unwise and unjust legislation in the institution of money, and imposing on the industrial, wealth-producing classes onerous and unnecessary burdens for the benefit of a privileged class.

Prominent among the objects for which Governments are instituted is the protection of life and property; it is then but even justice that each should share its rightful proportion of the burdens and sacrifices necessary for its support. Labor has, in the late struggle for the maintenance of the Government, fought the battles, furnished the food, clothing, arms, and munitions of war, with the means of transportation. In a word, the industrial classes performed their whole duty to the Government.

Now, let us see how money or non-producing capital, which is protected by the laws equally with labor, fulfilled its obligations to the Government. At the commencement of the rebellion money was abundant in our large commercial centers at from four to five per cent. on first-class securities. The first demand made by the Government was for a loan of some $8,000,000, for which it offered its bonds, bearing six per cent. interest, which, if my memory serves me right, was bid for at about eighty cents on the dollar, equal to seven and one half per cent. And the so-called capitalists went on increasing in their demands and warring on the credit of the Government until they got the rate of interest up to nine per cent. on the money of trade on the Government securities, and the bonds exempt from State and municipal taxes; and when in its extremity the Government was compelled to resort to the issue of Treasury notes, even this necessary and just measure met with their opposition. They forbade Congress making the Treasury notes a legal tender for the payment of the interest on the bonds, and nothing but their fears prevented the entire defeat of the measure.

Thus it will be seen that money has not only been exempt from the sacrifices that labor and human life have been subjected to, but, on the contrary, its value, and consequently its power, over property and labor has been doubled by the rebellion. And this, too, without rendering the Government or people any service whatever. If there had not been a bank note or gold dollar in the nation at the commencement of the war we should have got along infinitely better financially than we have. Gold and its worshipers have waged a continual war against the credit of the Government during all our troubles, and it is to-day of no more use to us as money than if every ounce of it was still in the California mines. And as for bank notes, they have been and are a fraud upon the rights of labor; no matter whether issued under State or national authority, their character is the same; and every true and loyal man prefers the plighted faith of the nation in the shape of legal-tender Treasury notes. This is the only money which has been truly loyal, and to it we are entirely indebted for our financial success. The soldiers and producers have always been willing to accept it for their services and supplies, and these are the classes that have defended and sustained the Government and upon whom the future hopes of the Republic depend. It is then the duty of the Government to protect the rights of these, its real supporters, rather than become an instrument in the hands of a few bankers and usurers for their oppression and degradation. If we add to the Government expenditures proper the payment of the debts incurred by States, counties, cities, and towns for war purposes, the sum will not fall below $400,000,000 annually, which will equal two per cent. on the entire national wealth. And the taxes for State and municipal purposes will be equal to at least three per cent. more; and it is but just that, as the Government bonds are not subject to tax for State and municipal purposes, they should be subjected to a higher tax by the Government than other property not so exempt; and the bill only contemplates for this purpose the imposition of what would be equal to one per cent. of the principal of the bond, which is only one third of the amount paid on other property.

Much, very much, remains to be said upon these very important subjects of legislation. But sufficient, I think, has been presented to convince any mind open to conviction that our monetary and revenue systems are founded on a wrong basis and work great injustice to the wealth-producing classes; that our falsely constituted monetary system is the monopoly of all monopolies; that railroad and other kindred monopolies are but a means by which this power despoils the industrial classes of their productions; that it is this which renders necessary our so-called protective, but in reality oppressive, tariff laws; that emancipation itself will be shorn of one of the principal benefits it should have conferred on the freedman, that of enjoying the product of his labor and talents; that the exemption of the Government securities, or any other species of productive property, from its equitable proportion of the burdens necessary for the maintenance of the Government, is at best but legalized repudiation and a step toward the establishment of a legal aristocracy; that if this chief of monopolies be stricken down these and all other systems of oppression will fall with it.

Money being necessary to facilitate the exchange of property, and the collection of the revenue being indispensable to the maintenance of the Government, it is not enough to show that the present systems are wrong, but it becomes equally important to present a better plan for the attainment of these ends, which I will now proceed to do.

Having shown the true nature of money and the functions it performs in the exchange of property and the payment of debts, and provided for the removal of the obstructions in the way of its institution on true principles, I come now to present what seems to be the true American monetary system, and to point out some of the more important advantages that would result to the Government and wealth-producing classes from its adoption. I will state in general way what is claimed for this system:

1. The circulating medium furnished by it will be adapted to the genius of our democratic republican institutions, in harmony with the letter and spirit of the Constitution, and suited to the wants of the Government and business interests of the nation.

2. It will be under the direct control of the sovereign people, who produce the values it is designed to represent, measure, and exchange, with the power vested in Congress to control its value, and consequently its power over labor and property, by regulating the rate of interest in the Government bonds into which it is made convertible at the option of the holder. With a just rate of interest established on the Government bonds sufficiently below the rate of increase in the national wealth as to make a fair distribution of the product of labor between non-producing capital and producing labor, laborers will receive an equitable proportion of their productions, and capital will likewise receive a just reward for its use.

3. It will be self-adjusting, for should money at any time become scarce and the rate of interest in legitimate transactions rise above the rate paid on the Government securities the bonds will be converted into money. On the contrary, should it become too abundant and the rate of interest fall below the rate paid on the Government bonds, the money would be converted into interest-bearing bonds to the extent necessary to restore the proper equilibrium; thus preventing the high and fluctuating rates of interest and the violent expansions and contractions of the currency that have been the cause of the monetary crises and commercial revolutions which have heretofore so frequently prostrated all branches of productive industry and paralyzed legitimate enterprise, deranged the commercial operations of the nation, lowered the standard of commercial integrity, and made us little less than a nation of gamblers. These revolutions are but the protest of labor against demands it cannot meet and burdens too grievous to be borne.

4. It will have equal legal powers, a uniform value, and perform all the functions of money throughout the entire jurisdiction of the Government.

5. It will discharge the national debt, interest and principal, in twenty-four years without the imposition of one farthing of taxes of any kind or nature whatever; and in addition thereto it will relieve the wealth-producing classes or tax-payers of an annual burden of over $600,000,000, now unnecessarily imposed on them by the present iniquitous system.

6. It will encourage and foster legitimate enterprise and productive industry in all departments of useful occupation more than all the so-called protective tariff laws that have ever been enacted. Under its operation commercial transactions can be conducted on an honorable and safe basis.

7. It will be simple in its workings, just in its bearings on all classes and interests. Each individual will have an interest in it proportionate to the amount of the products of his labor and talents, and a commensurate influence in its control. Requiring no aid from the bankers and financiers for its establishment or conduct, it will be emphatically the people's plan.

If the fifth and sixth propositions can be demonstrated, I think it will be admitted that the first, second, third, fourth, and seventh, must follow as a logical consequence.

I will, then, first exhibit the effects of its practical workings in the payment of the national debt. In determining this question, it becomes necessary to fix upon the probable amount of money required to make the exchanges and transact the business of the nation.

It must be borne in mind that it will take a much larger amount of money, in which all would have the fullest confidence, than of the miserable apology we have had, and always must have, under any system of banking, in the shape of bank notes or fallacious promises to pay money, in which none ever had or ought to have confidence.

1. A much larger amount of this legal money will be retained by farmers, mechanics, and others to meet future obligations than of a bank currency issued under any system.

2. Under this system, labor will receive a better compensation, and most of the ordinary business transactions would be for cash.

3. The intelligence and enterprise of the people, our unbounded natural resources in all that pertains to individual prosperity and national independence, and the extent of territory over which the money would circulate, must create a demand for a larger amount of circulation, per capita, than in any of the commercial nations of Europe.

I have the authority of H. C. Carey, Esq., who is among our ablest political economists, for saying that the circulation of England is about twenty-five dollars per capita and that of France over thirty dollars per capita.

I think it therefore safe to conclude that we would require as much as forty dollars per capita. The population of the United States is at this time as much as thirty-six millions, which, at forty dollars each, would require a circulation of $1,440,000,000. Estimating the national debt at $2,600,000,000, and deducting the amount that would circulate as money and bear no interest, would leave, as the interest-bearing portion of the debt, $1,160,000,000.

I have already shown that if agriculture be taken as the basis of the national wealth, and the division of products between landlord and tenant adopted as the standard of distribution between non-producing capital and labor, in all other departments of legitimate business the rate of interest on money should be but one and one ninth per cent. per annum. The adoption of this rate at once might be thought too violent a change from the present enormous rate. I will therefore show the result by computing the interest on the debt at the two several rates of two and a half and three per cent. per annum. The former rate would only give to the wealth-producing classes one fourth of their surplus products, and the latter but one tenth; and it is the highest rate that can be paid without taking from the industrial classes the property they already possess.

In order that money may be a true measure of values and distribute productions to producers equitably and uniformly it must be increased in volume in a like ratio with the increase in the population, wealth, and business of the nation. I have shown that the increase in the national wealth has averaged three and one third per cent. per annum, and will estimate the increase in the circulating medium at this rate.

RESULT WITH INTEREST COMPUTED AT TWO AND A HALF PER CENT.

According to the premises assumed the interest-bearing portion of the national debt, after deducting the amount that would circulate as money, would be $1,160,000,000. Interest first year $29,000,000; total principal and interest at the end of the first year, $1,189,000,000. Increase on $1,140,000,000 currency for first year $48,000,000, which, deducted from the total debt, would leave $1,141,000,000, the interest on which for the second year would be $28,525,000; total interest and principal at the end of second year $1,169,525,000. Add to the currency the increase for the first year, and the amount will be $1,488,000,000; the increase upon which for the second year would be $49,600,000; this deducted from the amount of the debt at the end of the second year would leave to bear interest for the third year $1,119,925,000. Add to the currency the increase for the second year, and the amount will be $1,537,600. This operation continued will in twenty-two years and eight months (very nearly) absorb the entire interest-bearing debt, and leave at the end of that period in circulation $3,023,290,000 of currency, which will bear the same proportion to the population, wealth, and business of the nation that the $1,440,000,000 does at the present time, and to keep values uniform will always be wanted for a circulating medium, and require to be increased thereafter in a like ratio with the increase in national wealth.

RESULT WITH INTEREST ON THE NATIONAL DEBT COMPUTED AT THREE PER CENT. PER ANNUM.

The increase in the currency will be the same as in the former case. Interest on the debt for first year, $34,800,000; total interest and principal at the end of first year $1,194,800,000; deduct the increase in the currency for first year $48,000,000, will leave interest-bearing debt at end of first year $1,146,800,000; interest on this sum for second year $34,404,000; total interest and principal of debt at the end of second year $1,181,204,000; deduct increase in currency for second year $49,600,000, leaving the interest-bearing debt at the end of the second year $1,131,604,000.

If this operation be continued as in the former case, the interest-bearing debt will be absorbed into the circulating medium of the country in twenty-four years, (nearly,) and will leave as the circulating medium $3,101,243,000, at the end of that time, which will bear the same proportion to the population, wealth, and business of the nation that $1,440,000,000 does at the present time; and which, in order to maintain the proper relation of the currency to the population and business, must be increased thereafter in a like ratio with the increase in the national wealth.

This increase for the first year after the liquidation of the debt would amount to $105,868,000, a sum sufficient to defray the major part of the ordinary current expenditures of the Government.

Thus it is demonstrated that the national debt, which under the present policy is bearing so heavily on the wealth-producing classes, and which threatens to hang like an incubus on them for generations to come, would by the system presented in the bill at once cease to be a charge, and would be liquidated without the imposition of one farthing of tax in less than a quarter of a century.

I come now to present some of the additional advantages the adoption of this system would confer on the wealth-producing classes or tax-payers. I have estimated that these classes were, under the present system, paying to non-producing capital rent or interest on three fifths of the national wealth or $12,000,000,000, and that the rate of interest averaged as much as eight per cent. annually. If the system here proposed be adopted, the $2,600,000,000 would cease to be a charge on the tax-payers, and must therefore be deducted from the $12,000,000,000 upon which the industrial classes are now paying interest or rent, which would leave $9,400,000,000 upon which they would have to pay interest or rent. Now, if this system be adopted, and the rate of interest on the Government indebtedness be fixed at three per cent., the account between non-producing capital and productive industry would stand thus:

$12,000,000,000 at 8 per cent.....	$960,000,000
9,400,000,000 at 3 per cent.....	282,000,000

Net annual saving to the tax-payers.....	678,000,000
--	-------------

With the rate of interest on the Government bonds at two and a half per cent., the result would be thus:

$12,000,000,000 at 8 per cent.....	960,000,000
9,400,000,000 at 2½ per cent.....	235,000,000

Net annual saving to the industrial wealth-producing class.....	$725,000,000
---	---------------

With the rate of interest at three per cent. the daily saving would amount to $1,857,534, and at two and a half per cent. it would be $1,986,300. The smallest of these annual savings would, in a few years, build the necessary furnaces, mills, and factories, to supply our wants as well as to construct all needful lines of transit. The wisdom of the policy of giving to labor all necessary protection in the development of our natural resources to the extent, at least, of supplying our own wants, is too manifest to admit of argument. But I think a greater delusion never entered the mind of man than that the effect of our so-called protective tariff laws is to encourage productive industry and protect our labor against the pauper-labor of Europe. Their effect is directly the opposite. They protect our aristocratic capital in the shape of fallacious bank promises against the capital of Europe, support a shoddy banking system, and build up a cotton and iron-mill aristocracy, and burden and oppress the wealth-producing classes.

The English Government securities bear three per cent. interest per annum, and with money instituted on true principles no sound reason can be given why it should bear a higher rate in the United States.

I have good authority for saying that with capital at three per cent., iron (an article of prime necessity) can be manufactured for the supply of the Northwest, at least from the ores of Lake Superior, Wisconsin, and Missouri, with the coals of Illinois, Chicago, St. Louis, and intermediate points in the coal basin in the valley of the Illinois river, without a fraction of protection beyond that afforded by the cost of transportation from Europe. And this I believe will be found true in other localities as well as other articles. We boast of our inexhaustible deposits of coal, iron, and other minerals, and their easiness of access; of our water-power and other advantages and facilities for manufacturing; and such indeed is the quality, abundance, and accessibility of our ores and coal that in the localities named it does not require over two thirds of the labor to produce a ton of iron that it does in England, where it is manufactured from lean ores dug from thin veins hundreds of feet below the earth's surface. Yet, with all these advantages we are told that labor cannot be employed in this important branch of industry without increased rates of protection.

The foregoing figures will, I think, explain this anomaly. I think they also show very clearly that the wrongs and oppressions which the industrial classes are suffering are caused by the unfair distribution of the productions of labor between non-producing capital and productive labor, resulting from the institution of money with such power over labor and property that even a prohibitory tariff could not afford them any general, permanent relief, for the reason that it would not reach and remove the cause. But with money instituted upon true principles and a just rate per cent. established for its use, laborers would receive an equitable proportion of their productions and capital a just reward for its use. All branches of productive industry would be quickened; capital would seek investment wherever there was a reasonable prospect of a fair return for its use. Instead of shipping the raw material across the continent, and even across the ocean, as we now do, manufactories of all kinds would be established wherever natural advantages and facilities offer, and the producer and the consumer brought side by side, and their exchanges made without the aid of middle men and extortionate carriers. New and competing lines of transit would be constructed wherever there was a prospect for a fair return on the investment. Thus the carrying monopolies, which are literally robbing the producing classes, would be destroyed.

The people could regulate the currency to suit themselves, and so few would be the articles needed, and so small the amount of protection required, that no serious objection would ever be made to it by any section or party. The vexed questions of the currency and protection would be very nearly entirely removed from our national councils, and the business of the nation would not, as under the present system, be subject to the control of a few avaricious bankers and the whims of some utopian financier who may chance to be called to the Secretaryship of the Treasury of the United States.

Here I propose to rest the argument, believing that sufficient has been presented to convince the most strenuous advocate of protection that the adoption of the monetary system proposed in the bill will do more to protect labor, foster and encourage productive industry and legitimate enterprises in the development of our natural resources than all the protective tariff laws that ever have or can be enacted; that the present wrongly constituted monetary system is the chief of monopolies, and its overthrow will cause the downfall of all railroad and other kindred monopolies.

I will now present and point out the fallacies of some of the objections that may be made to the proposed plan.

It may be objected that I have estimated the amount of the circulating medium necessary to make the exchanges of the property and products of the nation too high. To this I reply, the amount of currency needed by a nation is in proportion to its production; and as the adoption of this system would take away the occupation of the bankers, brokers, and speculators, they would be compelled to earn their living by honest industry, which would add them to the industrial classes, the direct effect of which would be to increase production; and the impetus given to enterprise by the establishment of a just rate of interest on money would require a much larger amount per capita than when, as under the present system, it is controlled and doled out to the people by a few selfish bankers. To this addition to the wealth-producing classes must be added the army of clerks, assessors, collectors, inspectors, and other officers and agents employed by the Government in the collection of the internal revenue; for under the operation of this system the Government expenditures would be so reduced that the funds necessary to defray the current expenses could be collected mainly from custom duties and the sale of the public domain. Any deficit that might occur could be assessed on the several States and collected by them with the employment of but little additional force beyond that required in the collection of the revenue for State purposes. Besides, the emancipation of labor from the thralldom imposed by the present false system, with the inducements offered by our agricultural and mineral resources and other advantages and facilities, would draw from the old world thousands of skilled miners, artisans, and others, which, I think, would soon create a demand for a greater rather than a less amount than I have estimated, and our debt would be absorbed into the currency in a shorter time than I have named.

It may, and probably will, be said that if interest is reduced to a just rate capitalists will emigrate and take their capital with them. Suppose all the bankers, usurers, and other drones, who live upon the proceeds of the industrial classes, should leave and take with them every gold dollar and bank in the nation, it would not injure the Government or wealth-producing classes. The Government could issue legal-tender Treasury notes to make the necessary exchanges of property and for the performance of all the other functions of money. Be it remembered that these mis-called capitalists cannot take with them the houses labor has built, the furnaces and factories it has created, the farms it has cleared, the mines it has opened, the railroads and canals it has constructed, and the other improvements it has made. Instead of a calamity, their departure would prove a positive blessing to the industrial classes, for it would relieve them from the cost of their maintenance.

It may be argued that if this system is adopted money will become so plenty that it will be valueless. This argument has no foundation in fact, for the money issued under it, being convertible into Government stocks, bearing a just rate of interest, will have a permanent and uniform value.

Again, it may be said that to lower the rate of interest on money will raise the price of all the products of labor, and consequently will be oppressive to labor.

This argument is equally groundless; for if the products of labor are high labor will be high also. To keep down prices by raising the rate of interest on money is simply to rob labor for the benefit of capital. By raising the rate of interest on money you increase the gains of the capitalists and decrease the value of labor.

Another and favorite objection that the bankers and their allies will make to this or any measure looking to the emancipation of labor from the thralldom imposed upon it by their false system is, that since money never has been instituted on a just principle it never can be. This is the argument used by kings and despots to prove that they have a divine right to rule, and that a democratic or republican Government is a trespass against divine authority, and never will be permitted to stand except for a brief period of time.

It has just as much force and reason in the former case as in the latter.

To say that the people will not accept in exchange for the products of their labor legal-tender Treasury notes, issued as provided in the bill, is to say that they will repudiate the Government; and to say they have not the intelligence and virtue necessary to properly regulate the currency, under the provisions of the bill, is to deny that they have the capacity for self-government.

I have shown, and I think clearly proven—

1. That the powers of money are legal and entirely independent of its material—its powers as money being derived from the law instituting it and making it a legal tender; that the power to make money and regulate its value is an essential attribute of sovereignty; and that it is the medium of distribution to non-producing capital and producing labor, the rate of interest determining what proportion of the products of labor shall be awarded to laborers for their productions and what to capital for its use.

2. That our present monetary system is founded on the aristocratic idea of government, and is inimical to and subversive of our democratic republican institutions. If continued in operation the wealth must be rapidly centralized in the hands of the few non-producers; the wealth-producing classes oppressed, degraded, and ultimately reduced to a state of positive servitude, democracy prove a failure, and universal suffrage a sham.

3. That it has been demonstrated with equal clearness that the monetary system contemplated by the bill is founded on the democratic idea of government, adapted to the genius of our free institutions, and in harmony with the letter and spirit of the Constitution; that under its operation labor would be properly compensated, the wealth diffused and distributed according to the labor or service performed in its production, democracy maintained, and universal suffrage rendered a universal blessing.

Having pointed out and, as I believe, fully sustained its superiority in all respects in an economical point of view, it only remains to show its advantages in a political point of view.

It would restore commercial relations between all parts of our common country; develop and harmonize that mutuality of interest which naturally exists between the different sections of our extended domain, growing out of varieties of climate and productions which by unwise legislation has been made to appear adverse and conflicting; it would interest each citizen pecuniarily in the preservation and perpetuity of the Government. Dispensing its blessings impartially to all, it would make us a homogeneous family of States—one in interest, one in sympathy, and one in purpose. United by these strong ties, our Union would stand proof alike against the machinations of enemies within and the assault of foes from without.

Pass the bill, adopt this system, separate the races, colonize the African, elect General Grant President in 1868, then peace, prosperity, and happiness will reign over our glorious country.

Mr. KOONTZ obtained the floor, but gave way to

Mr. HENDERSON, who moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at ten o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio: The memorial of V. Dell, Esq., chairman Republican State Committee of Arkansas, and J. M. Johnson and M. L. Stephenson, delegates from Republican State convention of Arkansas, praying Congress for the passage of an act authorizing the loyal citizens of Arkansas to organize a constitutional State government in said State.

By Mr. BALDWIN: The petition of Buck Brothers, and others, for relief from the five per cent. tax on edge tools and hardware.

By Mr. BANKS: The memorial of Anthony P. Zimandy, for compensation for military services rendered during the years of 1863 and 1864 in the West and Southwest, with the certificates of superior officers and evidences of service.

Also, the memorial of J. & R. Murphy, employes and manufacturers of cutlery and skates, Mansfield, Massachusetts; F. J. Alexander, and others, of Waltham, Massachusetts, manufacturers of clothes-wringers; George Lamb, and others, hardware manufacturers, Lawrence, Massachusetts, for the repeal of the five per cent. tax on sales of manufactures.

Also, the memorial of James Riddle, a private in the eighth regiment United States infantry, respecting his discharge, to be included within an act directing the Commissioner of Pensions to place his name on the roll of invalid pensions.

Also, the petition of John Fales, company E, third regiment artillery, for the passage of act granting him the benefit of the bounty law, of which he is deprived by a difference of three days in the time of his enlistment from the time when it was carried.

By Mr. BERGEN: Five several memorials of miscellaneous hardware manufacturers and operators of Brooklyn and Williamsburg, New York, asking for the repeal of the internal tax on such manufacture.

By Mr. BROMWELL: Two petitions of citizens of Onarga, Illinois; also one of citizens of Decatur, Illinois, praying Congress not to pass any law diminishing the volume of the currency, or any law compelling banks wherever located to redeem their notes in New York.

By Mr. CLARKE, of Ohio: The petition of S. D. Rice, and others, citizens of Brown county, Ohio, praying for the passage of the bill allowing extra bounty of eight and one third dollars per month to soldiers.

By Mr. CONKLING: The memorial of George H. Cramer, president of Rensselaer and Saratoga Railroad Company, asking reduction of duty on railroad iron.

By Mr. CULLOM: A petition signed by numerous citizens of Springfield, Illinois, asking Congress to change the law in relation to tax on cigars, so that the tax shall be specific and not more than five dollars per thousand on all domestic cigars, &c.

By Mr. DAWES: The memorial of E. T. Perry & Co., and employes, manufacturers of tacks in Massachusetts, for a repeal of the manufacturers' tax.

By Mr. DEMING: The memorial of the hardware manufacturers of Talsville, Connecticut, and of the William Rogers manufacturing company of Hartford, Connecticut, for the repeal of the tax of five per cent. upon the gross amount of the sales of manufactures.

By Mr. DRIGGS: The memorial of R. E. Harris, Benjamin Lentz, and others, of Limestone county, Alabama, praying Congress to impeach Andrew Johnson; also, of citizens of Matagorda, Texas, for the same object.

Also, the petition of T. D. Davery, and 40 others, citizens of Shiawassee county, Michigan, praying Congress not to pass any law for the curtailment of the national currency.

Also, the petition of William Henderson, and 38 others, citizens of Flint, Michigan, for the same object.

By Mr. ELIOT: The petition of Simeon Jones, and others, late officers of the Army and Navy of the United States, praying for an amendment of the act of June 21, 1866, concerning homesteads.

By Mr. FARNSWORTH: The petition of Charles Taylor, collector of customs at Indianola, Texas, for relief.

By Mr. HALE: Five petitions of officers of the United States Army, praying the restoration of the commutation value of the Army ration to fifty cents.

Also, the petition of Hon. Orange Ferriss, and others, citizens of Warren county, New York, praying for the establishment of duties on wool and woolsens at the rates proposed by the bill which passed the House of Representatives at its last session.

By Mr. HAYES: The petition of 30 business men, citizens of Cincinnati and Hamilton county, against further curtailment of the currency, and also against compelling the national banks to redeem their notes in New York.

Also, the petition of 400 journeymen cigar-makers, and manufacturers of cigars of Cincinnati, Ohio, in favor of a change in the present system of taxation on cigars; in favor of a specific tax of five per cent. per thousand on domestic cigars, retaining the present tariff on imported cigars, and selling stamps at five dollars per thousand.

By Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut: The memorial of Hotchkiss's Sons, and employes, manufacturers of hardware at Bridgeport, Connecticut.

Also, the memorial of the Greenwood Sythe Company of New Hartford, Connecticut.

Also, the memorial of American Shovel Company and Connecticut File Works, and operatives, of Bridgeport, Connecticut.

By Mr. HUNTER: The memorial of William G. Wren, in regard to the manufacture of gas from crude petroleum.

Also, the petition and memorial of Walter A. Peck, for relief for damage to his property and business at New Orleans by Major General B. F. Butler.

By Mr. MOORHEAD: The petition of citizens of Pittsburg, Pennsylvania, against any curtailment of the currency.

By Mr. PAINE: The petition of N. Simon, and others, manufacturers of cigars in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, for a modification of tax on cigars.

By Mr. RADFORD: The memorial of S. G. Howe & Co., and employes and others, file manufacturers of Sing Sing, New York, for repeal of five per cent. manufacturers' tax.

By Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts: The memorial of the hardware manufacturers of Roxbury, Massachusetts, for relief from the five per cent. tax on their manufactures.

By Mr. STOKES: The petition of Joseph W. Peace and 9 others, of Pikeville, Bledsoe county, East Tennessee, and 83 from other counties, for a constitutional amendment securing equality of political rights without distinction of race or color.

NOTICE OF A JOINT RESOLUTION.

By Mr. HILL: A joint resolution suspending the further retirement or cancellation of United States legal-tender Treasury notes for two years.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, January 19, 1867.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. E. H. GRAY. The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in compliance with the requirements of the fifth section of the act of April 21, 1868, a list of the contracts made by the officers and agents of the engineer department during the year 1866. The communication and accompanying papers were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented resolutions of the Windsor County Farmers' Club of Vermont, setting forth the interests of the American wool-growers, and asking Congress to furnish to them, as one of the great interests of the country, adequate and reasonable protection; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Hinesburg, Vermont, praying for further legislation in favor of the wool-growing interests of the country; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORGAN presented a petition of property-holders on I street north, between Fourteenth and Sixteenth streets west, Washington, District of Columbia, praying for an amendment of the law in relation to sewerage, so that property fronting on street improvements may be moderately taxed, and the payment of all such taxes be made in installments at reasonable periods within two years; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

He also presented a memorial of underwriters, merchants, manufacturers, and ship-owners of the city of New York, remonstrating against the section in the new tariff bill authorizing the sale at auction of merchandise damaged on the voyage over twenty-five per cent.; which was ordered to lie on the table.

He also presented six petitions of citizens of New York, praying for the imposition of an increased duty on all foreign wool; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. HARRIS presented five petitions of citizens of New York, praying for the imposition of an increased duty on all foreign wool; which were ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. LANE presented a memorial of citizens of Indiana, remonstrating against any reduction in the national currency, and praying for a change in the national banking law so that the law of each State on the subject of interest and usury shall apply to national banks; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BROWN presented a petition of citizens of Missouri, remonstrating against any reduction of the national currency, and against compelling national banks to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting them from paying or receiving interest on bank balances; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BROWN. I also present a petition from certain ladies respectfully asking for an amendment of the Constitution that shall prohibit the several States from disfranchising any of their citizens on the ground of sex. In making their demand for suffrage, they say that they wish to call the attention of Congress to the fact that they represent fifteen million people—one half the entire population of the country—intelligent, virtuous, native-born American citizens, and yet stand outside the pale of political recognition. The petitioners further state that the Constitution classes them as "free people," and counts them whole persons in the basis of representation; and yet they are governed without their consent, compelled to pay taxes without appeal, and punished for violations of law without choice of judge or juror. They further declare that the experience of all ages, the declarations of the fathers, the statute laws of our own day, and the fearful revolution through which we have just passed, all prove the uncertain tenure of life, liberty, and property so long as the ballot, the only weapon of self-protection, is not in the hand of every citizen. Therefore, as we are now amending the Constitution, and, in harmony with advancing civilization, placing new safeguards around the individual rights of four million emancipated slaves, the petitioners ask Congress to extend the right of suffrage to woman—the only class of disfranchised citizens—and thus fulfill our constitutional obligation "to guaranty to every State in the Union a republican form of government." As all partial application of republican principles must ever breed a complicated legislation as well as a discontented people, the petitioners further pray Congress, in order to simplify the machinery of Government and insure domestic tranquility, to legislate hereafter for persons, citizens, tax-payers, and not for class or caste. I ask that this petition be laid upon the table. It was so ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY presented a memorial of citizens of Rhode Island, remonstrating against any curtailment of the national currency, and against compelling all national banks to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting them from paying or receiving interest on bank balances; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COWAN presented a memorial of citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against any curtailment of the national currency, and against compelling all national banks to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting them from paying or receiving interest on bank balances; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of manufacturers of cotton and woolen fabrics, praying for certain modifications of the internal revenue laws by removing the five per cent. tax on goods, the allowance of a drawback of three cents per pound on cotton to be refunded to the manufacturer, and the imposition of a tax on all luxuries which are not produced in the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILSON presented three petitions of officers of the Army and the Marine corps of the United States, praying for an increase of their pay by restoring the commutation of the Army ration to fifty cents; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. EDMUNDS presented a petition of William Joslin, praying that he may be remunerated for certain United States bonds destroyed by fire on the 10th of February, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HENDRICKS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was recommitting the bill (S. No. 452) to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to accept League Island, in the Delaware river, for naval purposes, and to dispense with and dispose of the site of the existing yard at Philadelphia, reported it without amendment.

Mr. POLAND, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives proposing an additional joint rule for the appointment of a joint Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds; which was agreed to.

Mr. LANE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Kennedy O'Brien, late a private in company K, fifth Indiana volunteers, praying for an increase of pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 513) for the relief of Kennedy O'Brien. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Patrick Meehan, of Decatur, Indiana, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 513) granting a pension to Patrick Meehan. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Charles Appleton, late of the United States Army, praying for an increase of pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 514) for the relief of Charles Appleton. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Ernestine Becker, widow of Leopold Becker, late captain of company D, twenty-fourth regiment Illinois infantry, praying to be allowed a pension, submitted a report accompanied by a bill (S. No. 515) granting a pension to Mrs. Ernestine Becker. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Jacob C. Wentworth, of Somersworth, New Hampshire, praying that a pension may be granted him on account of a disability incurred while a landsman on board the United States frigate Colorado, submitted an adverse report, and asked to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject; which was agreed to.

MRS. MARY E. FINNEY.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am instructed by the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mrs. Mary E. Finney, praying to be allowed the three months' extra pay due her late husband, Solon H. Finney, a lieutenant in the sixth regiment Michigan cavalry, to report a bill for her relief; and I ask that the bill may be considered at this time and put upon its passage, if there be no objection.

By unanimous consent the bill (S. No. 511) for the relief of Mrs. Mary E. Finney, widow of first lieutenant Solon H. Finney, late of the sixth regiment Michigan cavalry, was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It directs the payment to her of the three months' extra pay proper which her husband by law would have been entitled to receive had he been mustered out of service after April 9, 1865, he having died of wounds received in battle on the 9th of April, 1865.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 516) additional to an act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from Lake Superior to Puget Sound, on the Pacific coast, by the northern route; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. STEWART asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 517) to reimburse S. B. Wallace and others expenses incurred by them for the suppression of Indian hostilities; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. STEWART. I desire also to present certain vouchers and papers explanatory of that bill, and ask to have them referred to the same committee.

They were so referred.

COLORED SCHOOLS IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire whether or not the corporation of Washington has conformed to the requirements of the several acts of Congress in relation to the support of colored schools in the cities of Washington and Georgetown, District of Columbia; and that said committee be instructed to report the facts, and recommend such action as may be deemed necessary and proper; also, that said committee have authority to call for persons and papers.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills and joint resolutions, in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 140) to restore Lieutenant Joseph P. Fyffe to his grade in the active service of the Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 710) to pay and discharge certain debts and expenditures to the corporation of the city of Washington;

A bill (H. R. No. 843) for the relief of Rufus C. Spalding, paymaster in the United States Navy;

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 175) to audit and pay the claim of Tuller & Fisher; and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 216) for the restoration of Lieutenant Commander S. L. Breese, United States Navy, to the active list from the retired list.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 311) for the relief of James Pool; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore of the Senate.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. HARRIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill, No. 438.

Mr. WADE. I hope not. I hope we shall proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday; that is, the bill to authorize the extension of a branch of the Baltimore and Potomac railroad into this city. I suppose it will not take long to dispose of it, and there is a reason why it should be acted upon at once. It is the unfinished business. I do not know what bill the Senator proposes to call up; but there is a reason why this one should be considered and disposed of.

Mr. HARRIS. I have a small bill that I have been desirous of having action upon all this session, but still I will not press it against the Senator's wishes.

Mr. SUMNER. I should like to call up the resolution that I offered yesterday, which is merely asking for information, and have it acted upon.

Mr. HARRIS. The bill that I have moved to take up is a bill for the relief of the heirs of John E. Bouligny. However, I will waive my motion until the bill of the Senator from Ohio is disposed of.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from New York is withdrawn.

Mr. WADE. I move to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is House bill No. 598, being the bankrupt bill. Senators in favor of the motion to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business, being the bankrupt bill, will say "ay;" those opposed, "no."

The motion was agreed to.

The Secretary read the title of the bill as follows: A bill to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. WADE. I do not know how that bill comes up in preference to this other bill; but I will move to postpone all prior orders and take up House bill No. 388. I do not suppose it will take long to dispose of it.

Mr. SHEEMAN. I suppose the misapprehension grew out of my colleague moving to take up the unfinished business of yesterday instead of the unfinished business of yesterday's morning hour.

Mr. WADE. The unfinished business of the morning hour, as I understand, is the bill which I have in my hand, House bill No. 388.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Ohio was, that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of yesterday, and the Chair put the motion. That bill is House bill No. 598, to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States.

Mr. WADE. Then, if there is anything in that point, I will move to amend the motion so as to proceed to the consideration of the unfinished business of the morning hour of yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Both motions were in order.

Mr. POLAND. I shall not object to the gentleman occupying the time until one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 388) to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Potomac railroad into and within the District of Columbia.

Mr. LANE. I understood that the unfinished business of the morning hour was the bill in regard to the appointment of pension agents. The morning hour certainly expired when we were about to vote upon that bill.

Mr. WADE. The gentleman is mistaken. This bill was up last in the morning hour.

Mr. LANE. The morning hour expired when we were upon that pension bill according to my recollection.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio names this bill House bill No. 388, and the Chair states the question to the Senate as being the motion to take up this bill. Whether it be the unfinished business of the morning hour or not, the Senator from Ohio makes the motion that the Senate proceed to its consideration. The motion is in order.

Mr. POLAND. I should like to inquire whether if this motion prevails and this bill is now taken up, it will interfere with the regular order at one o'clock, the unfinished business of yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business will come up under the rule at one o'clock.

Mr. POLAND. I have no objection, then.

BALTIMORE AND POTOMAC RAILROAD.

The motion of Mr. WADE was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 388) to authorize the extension, construction, and use of a lateral branch of the Baltimore and Potomac railroad into and within the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I have not looked at the charter of this company granted by Maryland. I do not know that I ever saw it; if I did I certainly have not refreshed my recollection of its character lately; but I have been advised by some members of the Legislature that that charter was not intended to authorize the company incorporated under it to come into the District of Columbia at all. The purpose of the charter, as stated to me, was to give the company merely the power to make a road through the peninsula of Maryland, so as to connect with the southern route through Virginia, at Aquia creek or some adjoining place. The subject is now, I am told, under deliberation in the Legislature of Maryland.

Personally I have certainly no objection to grant every facility to enterprises of this description, particularly such as may benefit the regions of country of my own State through which the particular road will pass; but under the circumstances I submit to the honorable member from Ohio whether it will not be advisable to let the bill upon the table remain unacted upon until Maryland shall have acted upon the question of the charter which she has heretofore granted; for this bill, if we shall pass it, will be inoperative entirely, provided it shall turn out that the company which it authorizes to come into the District of Columbia, after striking the line which divides the District of Columbia from Maryland, has no authority to come up to that line. The bill does not propose, and I suppose the Senate would not authorize such a step if it was projected, to make the road throughout any portion of the Maryland territory.

Now, I repeat in the hearing of my friend from Ohio that I have not seen the charter of the Baltimore and Potomac Railroad Company, and in what I have said therefore I am acting upon the information which I have received from some members of the Legislature. Whether that information is well founded, I of course am not prepared to say. I should prefer, if the honorable member has no objection to it, that the matter should be postponed until Maryland shall have had an opportunity of being heard through her Legislature, or at any rate until I shall have an opportunity of looking at the charter. Maryland has an interest which may in her judgment render it improper to authorize this particular improvement. She has a very large interest as a stockholder in the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company, the main road: she has I believe an interest as a stockholder in the Washington Branch; but she has a deeper interest in the branch road, because she is entitled to a certain proportion of the passage money which that road may earn. If she refuses to authorize this company to come to the line of the District of Columbia, she may be governed by the opinion that it would very much interfere with the interest which she has in the two roads which I have mentioned.

The receipts into the Maryland treasury from the main stem of the Baltimore and Ohio road as a stockholder and from the branch amount to some two hundred and fifty or three hundred thousand dollars, I forget the exact amount, but it is very considerable; and in the present state of her finances it is a matter of moment to her that she should not lose any portion of that revenue; and it may be that, however valuable this improvement shall turn out to be to the section through which it passes or to the country generally, she may not think this the time to authorize it if it has not been already authorized. If it has been authorized by the charter which she has passed, as the company has organized itself under that charter I believe, there will be then as between Maryland and the company a contract which no legislation upon her part could in any way affect; but whether that be the case or not is, as I am told, a subject under consideration in the Legislature now in session.

And in closing I merely repeat what I have said, that upon every ground of former association as well as of present association, speaking now only as a citizen of Maryland, I should rejoice in seeing the people of that part of the State who are to be benefited by this road receive that benefit if it can be done consistently with the interests of the entire State. I am not prepared to say whether that can be accomplished or not. If therefore my friend will permit the bill to lie on the table for a day or two, I shall offer no opposition to it unless I receive something in the nature of instruction, which in a case like this perhaps might govern me, although perhaps as instructions merely I should never be governed by the opinion of the Legislature. Except upon that contingency I shall offer no objection to the passage of this bill. I have always thought that the more those improvements are multiplied to any reasonable extent the better it is for the whole country.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, this question has been long pending before Congress. I believe that during most of the long session last year it was pending before the Committee on the District of Columbia. The various interests concerned were heard before that committee on several occasions, and I believe that everything that can be said on the subject pro and con was said to the committee. The bill has been greatly delayed, and there are reasons why it should be passed upon as expeditiously as possible. There was a dispute before the committee, as is very natural in such cases. Those that represent and are interested in the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company of course do not wish to have another branch road, coming in competition with theirs, enter the city of Washington.

In 1853 the Legislature of Maryland granted a charter to this company to construct a railroad from Baltimore to some point on the Potomac river not far from Port Tobacco, but not defining exactly where it should run, and only prescribing the route in a general way; and they authorized that company to establish lateral branches of the road thus provided for, and gave them four years within which to commence and finish the road. The company did not commence the road within the time mentioned, and then the Legislature of Maryland granted them a further term of four years. Still the road was not constructed, and the Legislature lengthened out the time until 1869, and gave them until that period to establish this road with these lateral branches.

That is what the Legislature of Maryland has done upon the subject. I have before me the act granting the charter and authorizing the company to build the road and the other acts by which the time has been lengthened out, and how it can be said that there can be any question before the Maryland Legislature in regard to this road at this time I can hardly see, because not less than twice after granting the charter, after full deliberation, the Legislature have continued the rights of this company and for the best of all reasons. They were to construct a railroad from Baltimore to the Potomac river for the purpose of connecting with and continuing the great southern line of travel and communication. Then the Legislature gave the company the right to establish lateral branches, not saying where they should run. Of course they wanted to run a branch into this city. I suppose the line of the main railroad of this company will pass not far from the town of Marlboro', in Prince George's county, and they propose, I believe, to run a branch from somewhere there into the city; and the only question before Congress now is whether we shall authorize the company to bring their branch into the District of Columbia and into the city of Washington; and if anybody can show me a reason why we should not do it he will do more than in my judgment has yet been shown.

We have now but one railroad entering into this city, and it is a monopoly without a rival. I do not say that that company do not use their privileges reasonably. I am not going to contend now about that, although a good deal of complaint has been made that they do exact unreasonable tolls on those who come over their road; but at all events the public will not suffer if a railroad should be made in some measure in competition with it. I am sure the citizens of this District and the public generally will lose nothing by opening communication from that very garden of Maryland into this city by which marketing can be brought in here much cheaper than in other ways.

I do not propose at this time to prolong the argument, because I see no reason why any gentleman should be opposed to permitting a railroad company, having their charter from Maryland to run in that State, to have the privilege of bringing a branch of their road into this city; and that is the only question here.

It is said that the Legislature of Maryland are acting upon some question about it. I understand that the corporation have entered upon the construction of this road within the time limited in the charter and the acts of the Legislature giving further time, and with three or four years to spare they are now working on the road; so that what the Legislature of Maryland can do in that behalf I am not able to see. I know the right of the company is strenuously contended against, and it is natural enough that it should be, for undoubtedly it is somewhat opposed to the interests of those who hold the monopoly of the other road; and that is all there is in the case. Shall the people of this District and the public at large give up their interest to this private incorporation; or shall we, for the public interest, permit another road to come in there? Unless somebody can suggest some reason why it should not be done, I will not prolong the argument on the subject, but hope that every gentleman will see that the interests of the public and of this District require that this corporation should be authorized to construct this road.

Mr. JOHNSON. My friend from Ohio did not understand me correctly if he supposed that I disputed the validity of the charter of the Baltimore and Potomac Company. The State had, of course, the power to charter that company, and although she exacted from them an obligation to begin and complete the road within a certain time it was for her to say whether she would enforce that obligation. She has extended the time very properly; but that is not the difficulty as I understand. It is true that the charter gives, as I am told and as my friend from Ohio states, to the company the right to make lateral roads; but the opinion entertained in Maryland is, as I understand, that that was not intended to authorize the company to come to the District of Columbia so as to enable the company to construct a road nearly parallel with, and therefore antagonistic to the present road from the city of Baltimore to the city of Washington. Whether that is the construction of the charter, or whether it is what Maryland intended but has failed to provide for, I am not prepared to say. All that I suggested was that that impression prevailed and that the subject is now under consideration in the Legislature.

But I will state to the honorable member from Ohio and to the Senate, what I think will induce him and the Senate to agree to postpone the bill, that my colleague [Mr. CRESWELL] is very anxious to be present when this bill is disposed of. He is not here now, but I have reason to believe that he will be here in a day or two; and I think it has always been—and I am sure no one would be more likely than the honorable member to consider it as due as a courtesy to him if he was placed in that situation—it has always been customary to postpone any measure that affects a particular State if the Senator or Senators from that State are absent and it is known that he or they desire to be heard upon the subject. My colleague went to his home upon professional business, the court being in session. I presume the court will close to-day, and he will be here on Monday or Tuesday. I submit, therefore, whether, looking to the courtesy which we observe toward each other, it is not better to let the matter stand until he shall be here. I certainly have no desire to make any objection to the passage of this bill for the simple purposes of delay.

Mr. WADE. I have never heard that the colleague of the Senator from Maryland took any particular interest in this matter.

Mr. JOHNSON. He told me so; but it was at the last session, it is true.

Mr. WADE. I do not deny that; but I never heard anything of it before, and certainly that gentleman's colleague here is a very able advocate for any interest that Maryland may have. There are reasons why this bill should be passed as soon as it may be; but I should not like to be guilty of any act of discourtesy. It does seem to me that the opposition to the bill is hardly capable of any very strenuous advocacy from any quarter, however able it may be. I can only say that there are many interests affected anxious for the passage of this bill, and it has already been greatly delayed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I should like to ask the Senator where this road is to run; what road it is.

Mr. WADE. The main road is to run from Baltimore to the Potomac river in the neighborhood of Port Tobacco, passing near the county seat of Prince George's county, Marlboro'. That is the direction of the main line of the road according to the charter, with power in the company to establish lateral branches without any limitation. That is the power granted in the charter and passed upon twice by the State of Maryland. The company have commenced operations on the road and are very anxious, as they naturally would be, to know whether they are to be permitted to run a branch of their road into this District or not; and the only question now before Congress is whether or not they shall be authorized to do that. Of course they can make their other road because Maryland has said they might; but they cannot come into the District unless Congress gives them leave to do so, and that is the only question here.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I wish to ask the Senator another question, whether this branch was contemplated by the Legislature. Is it provided for in the act of incorporation?

Mr. WADE. I do not know. The language of the statute is general, without any restriction. I suppose they can run branches where they please, provided they can get authority from the proper jurisdiction, and Maryland cannot stop them. The twelfth section of their charter—I will not read the whole of it, it is too long—provides that the company—

"May make and construct all works whatever which may be necessary and expedient in order to the proper completion and maintenance of said road, and they may make or cause to be made lateral railways in any direction whatever from the said railroad, and for the construction, repair, and maintenance thereof."

It seems to be as large a power as could be given, without any limitation.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not think the subject is much understood in the Senate; I know I do not understand it, and therefore I ask the Senator these questions. I ask him now how much of this road will be in the State of Maryland and how much in the District of Columbia?

Mr. WADE. I do not know exactly; but I suppose some ten or twelve miles of it will be in Maryland and the remainder in the District, some three miles perhaps; but that I only guess at.

Mr. JOHNSON. Ten or twelve miles.

Mr. WADE. And about three miles in the District, I am told.

Mr. JOHNSON. I do not know where the main stem will run. If the main stem runs from Marlboro'—

Mr. WADE. Near Marlboro'.

Mr. JOHNSON. If that is the point from which the lateral road is to be made, it would be twelve or thirteen miles I think till it would reach the District line.

Mr. WADE. I do not know the distance which the route of this road will be, but I believe Marlboro' is sixteen or eighteen miles from here.

Mr. JOHNSON. It cannot run more than four or five miles in the District if it comes in on that side of the District.

Mr. WADE. It runs near Marlboro' and is to come from there into the District.

Mr. JOHNSON. The distance from the District line to Marlboro' is about ten or twelve miles in Maryland; but the whole length of the road will be I suppose thirty miles from there to Baltimore; and then they have to run to the Potomac river also.

Mr. GRIMES. Will it go to Annapolis or near it?

Mr. JOHNSON. That depends on the route.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I want to know—the Senator from Maryland I suppose can inform me—how far from the point where this branch leaves the main line it runs in Maryland and how far in the District of Columbia.

Mr. JOHNSON. I cannot tell.

Mr. WADE. Both parties were before the committee and the route was marked out and mapped. It was said by one of the parties that this would be a shorter road to Baltimore than the present road. The other contended that it would not be much shorter. On actual survey it was claimed by the advocates of this new road that the distance to Baltimore by the route proposed would be four miles shorter than by the present road; but I suppose it makes no great difference whether they were precisely accurate or not in that.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like to inquire whether the road this bill authorizes is entirely within the District of Columbia, so far as the bill which is now before the Senate is concerned, or whether any part of it is in Maryland.

Mr. WADE. This bill proposes to give authority to construct the road in the District and to bring it to the city. That is exactly what this bill is for, and all there is in it. I do not think there is any reason why we should not pass it at once.

Mr. HENDRICKS. With the information I have on this subject, I cannot vote for this road. The commercial and traveling interests of the country do not seem to require another road between this city and Baltimore. At the commencement of the war there was a difficulty because the Baltimore and Ohio branch had but one track; but during the war, for the purpose of accommodating the increased business of transportation of munitions of war and commerce and passengers, a second track was laid down by that company between this city and Baltimore, making a very admirable road, as far as I have observed and heard; and that road is well managed, well conducted. A very large capital has been put into that road and into the main Baltimore and Ohio road—a road of great importance to the western country—a road that competes well with the Pennsylvania Central in transporting our western productions; and I would not wish to construct, for the purpose of speculation, a competing road, that is not called for by the business of the country.

With the information I now have on the subject I cannot vote for this bill. I regard the Baltimore and Ohio road as of very great importance to the western country, especially that commerce and business that goes into Cincinnati from our State and from other western States. I should be reluctant to vote for any road that would cripple it to any extent.

Mr. YATES. Having been on the committee—

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday.

Mr. WADE. I move that the unfinished business be informally passed over, that the Senate may proceed with the consideration of this bill.

Mr. POLAND. I have yielded to the gentleman and to almost every other gentleman, and if I could be satisfied that nothing remained to be done but simply to take a vote on this bill I should be quite content to have that done; but I see very strong indications that that is not to be the case. I cannot consent to let the regular order go by.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business, which is House bill No. 598, the bankrupt bill; that bill is before the Senate and will be read.

Mr. WADE. I move to postpone that bill for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the bill which has been before the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. I hope that will not be done in the absence of my colleague. I know last session he was very anxious to be here when this bill should be considered; and he will be here on Monday no doubt, or on Tuesday anyhow.

Mr. YATES. Having been on the committee where this matter has had very thorough consideration, and where we heard the colleague of the honorable Senator from Maryland, I arose to state that from the investigation before the committee I understand that this road in its entire length is seventy-one miles, and the branch is ten miles; and the only privilege the company ask is to come into Washington with their branch. I cannot appreciate the argument of my friend from Indiana that another road from Baltimore to Washington will be any crippling of the enterprise or business of the great West. I hope that the motion to postpone will prevail, so that we may go on with the bill.

Mr. WADE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 10, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Fogg, Fowler, Morrill, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Wade, Wilson, and Yates—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Howard, Howe, Johnson, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Norton, Patterson, Poland, and Williams—21.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Davis, Edmunds, Guthrie, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Sumner, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Willey—21.

So the motion of Mr. WADE was not agreed to.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills and joint resolutions from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

A bill (H. R. No. 140) to restore Lieutenant Joseph F. Fyffe to his grade in the active service of the Navy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A bill (H. R. No. 710) to pay and discharge certain debts and expenditures to the corporation of the city of Washington—to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A bill (H. R. No. 843) for the relief of Rufus C. Spalding, paymaster in the United States Navy—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 175) to audit and pay the claim of Tuller & Fisher, of Missouri—to the Committee on Claims.

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 216) for the restoration of Lieutenant Commander S. L. Breeze, of the United States Navy, to the active list from the retired list—to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

BANKRUPT BILL.

The PRESIDENT, pro tempore. The unfinished business of yesterday is the bill (H. R. No. 598) to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, which is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. It will be read.

The Secretary read the bill at length.

The first amendment reported by the Committee on the Judiciary was in section three, line two, to strike out the word "circuit" and insert "district;" so as to read:

That it shall be the duty of the judges of the district courts of the United States within and for the several districts, &c.

Mr. GRIMES. I beg to inquire of the Senator who has charge of this bill why it is proposed to take this power away from the circuit judges and to confer it upon the district judges.

Mr. POLAND. Perhaps, Mr. President, I ought to say in the outset in reference to this bankrupt bill that it is one which originated in the House of Representatives, and one for which I am in no particular way responsible; it was in consequence of some peculiar circumstances that the bill fell in my charge in the Senate; and therefore I can hardly be called upon to give all the reasons in reference to why it is drawn in the particular way that it is, as if I had been the author of the bill. But in reference to this amendment I can state the reasons that actuated the committee in proposing it.

The bill provides that there shall be certain officers called registers appointed, one at least in each congressional district throughout the country. The duty of these officers is merely ministerial and clerical. They have no judicial duty whatever to perform. They are to go around and perform clerical and ministerial duty, gathering the proof of debts, settling the estates of bankrupts. It is important that the appointing power of those officers should be given to somebody who has the means of knowing who are the proper men to appoint, and who will be likely to appoint suitable, good men for that purpose. The bill as it was originally drawn provided that these appointments should be made by the judges of the circuit court; it was amended, and as it passed the House of Representatives it provided that the appointment should be made by the judges of the several circuit courts upon the nomination of the Chief Justice of the United States. Substantially it gave the appointment of these local officers, comparatively insignificant officers, throughout the entire country to the Chief Justice of the United States. The Chief Justice of the United States I regard as a very excellent man and a very suitable man to perform the duties that properly pertain to the office of Chief Justice of the United States; but it seemed to the committee that this was a very unsuitable provision for the appointment of these local officers about over the whole country. The Chief Justice of the United States of course could have no personal knowledge in relation to the class of men from whom these officers are to be selected, except in the particular portion of the country where he may have himself resided. If the duties that were to be performed by this class of officers were such that eminent legal men would be required, if that was the class of men from whom these appointments were to be made, then they might perhaps be made properly by the Chief Justice of the United States; but lawyers who are eminent in their profession, men of high legal attainments, high legal credit, are not the class of men who could accept or would accept these appointments. They are to be made from respectable men, but a lower class of lawyers as to professional standing. The committee thought that the proper place to deposit this power of appointment was in the district judges, who, of course, know the entire bar within their district.

The same objection would obtain although in less degree to having the circuit judge have anything to do with the appointment. Take the circuit in which I live; our circuit is composed of the three districts in the State of New York, the district of Vermont, and the district of Connecticut. Mr. Justice Nelson is the circuit judge. It is a very rare thing that he comes to the State of Vermont at all to hold a circuit court. But very few times for several years has the circuit court been held by the circuit judge of that circuit; he knows nothing in relation to the bar of Vermont except a very few of the leading lawyers, men who would not be selected at all to perform this office and duty of register, while the district judge, who is a resident of the State and always has been, knows the entire bar of the State who would be suitable and proper men; and in my judgment, and that I believe was the unanimous judgment of the committee, the appointment of these officers we regard as altogether better and safer to be given to the district judge who personally knows all that class of men from whom the selections are to be made, rather than to give it to perhaps a more eminent man who knows nothing at all on that subject.

The question being put on the amendment, a division was called for.

Mr. HOWE. If there is to be a division I shall vote against this amendment proposed by the committee. It seems to me the ground upon which it is urged is a mistaken one, and will be found so practically. I do not think, let those appointments be made by either the district or the circuit judge or the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, he will ever be guided by what he knows personally of the fitness or unfitness of his appointees; he will be guided by the opinions of the bar practicing in his court, let who will make the appointment.

Mr. POLAND. Then what difference does it make who appoints them?

Mr. HOWE. It does make a decided difference who appoints them in some States. There is no more reason either why the judge should personally know the individual to be appointed than there is why the President of the United States should know the individuals whom he is called upon to appoint. I think the circuit judge can be trusted with the selection of these officers, by and with the advice and consent of the bar of his circuit; and it seems to me to be a reflection upon the character of the circuit judges that they should be stricken out of the bill, and the district judges substituted in their place; I shall therefore vote against the amendment.

Mr. GRIMES. I am not prepared to say that the proposition in the bill which comes from the House of Representatives is the wisest that could be devised. I do not pretend to say that it would be expedient to let in the last instance all these appointments be made by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court; but what I would like to get, if I could, would be an opportunity to vote in favor of conferring this power on the circuit judges of the respective circuits, instead of conferring it upon the local district judges.

In the first place, it seems to me that is where it ought to be lodged from various considerations, and I have heard no reason assigned by the Senator from Vermont why it should not be lodged there except that it is presumed that the district judges are better informed of the personal and professional qualifications of the people within their districts than the members of the Supreme Court are when performing circuit duty; and he illustrates it by reference to the case of his own particular State. That is not the case generally I think. I think that as a general thing the circuit judges, certainly in the northwestern country, perform all the duties imposed upon them by the laws of the United States and hold their respective circuit courts; and I apprehend that they are almost, if not quite, as familiar with the personal characteristics and qualifications of the citizens who would be competent to perform the duties that are required of these officers as the judges of the district courts are. I shall therefore vote against this amendment, and if it does not carry, I hope we shall so frame the section as to confer the power upon the circuit judges entirely.

Mr. WILLIAMS. My vote on this amendment reported by the committee would be influenced by the action the Senate may take on the other amendment which is to follow it, if I could know what that action would be. I think it is not very important whether these appointments are made by the circuit or the district judges if they are made upon the nomination or recommendation of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States. I believe that that clause of the section ought to be retained. I think that under existing circumstances the amendment which has been recommended by the committee to strike out that clause ought not to be adopted; and if that clause which the committee move to strike out is retained in the bill, I do not care whether the district or circuit judges make the appointments. If that clause be retained, I have nothing further to say; but I have some choice, so far as my State is concerned, between the district and circuit judges in the making of these appointments.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to say that that would entirely satisfy me and those few gentlemen who think as I do upon this subject. I am perfectly content that the word "circuit" should be stricken out and the word "district" inserted in its place, provided the other clause is retained which the committee have proposed to strike out.

Mr. POLAND. It would not make much difference how this was arranged if that was left in.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suppose, Mr. President we may just as well speak out and let everybody understand what all this means. The provision as it now stands in the House bill, I take it, was a sort of compromise on this question between the circuit and district judges. In some of the districts, district judges have been recently appointed who are Republicans, of the prevailing party of the present time; but in many of the districts they are otherwise, being judges who were appointed in former times; but owing to the change of circuits the circuit judges in some of those districts are of a different political faith.

Now, the contest seems to be who shall have these little registerships, whether they shall all go to the dominant party or whether they shall not. Those in favor of having the appointments given to the district judges I suppose are those residing in districts where the district judges are of their way of thinking, and those who want to give them to the circuit judges are those residing in districts where the circuit and not the district judges are of their way of thinking. Thus arises a controversy over a very small matter.

I shall vote for the amendment, not particularly because it would suit my case exactly, for I do not think it of consequence enough one way or the other, (though I have no objection to having the section stand as it is by way of compromise if a difficulty is to be made about it,) but I shall vote for it for this simple reason: this bill places about all the power with reference to bankruptcy in the hands of the district judge. He is the judge of the court of bankruptcy; he does the business; he supervises the whole matter. These registers are under his direction, operate with him and under him. If I read the bill rightly, the circuit judge has substantially only appellate jurisdiction in cases to be submitted to him on a bill in equity or otherwise.

The whole principle on which our small judiciary appointments have been conducted heretofore is that the judges of the courts who do the business should have the appointment of the inferior officers. It is proper that a judge should have in his court such persons as are satisfactory to him and in harmony with him; and I should be in favor of adhering to that principle. I am not so much afraid of these matters, however, because it is true in regard to judges as in regard to other people that they sometimes die. They do not always die soon enough, perhaps, but their time comes at last, and there may be a change; and in the course of a few years the change may be directly the other way from what some gentlemen apprehend. We cannot tell what will happen in relation to the districts. But in framing a bill of this kind I think it should be framed upon some sort of principle, and not be constructed with particular reference to who is to appoint half a dozen registers in a State for a court of bankruptcy, who may be turned out when their time comes or when the judge is changed. I have noticed, however, as a general rule, that judges, after they get safely on the bench in a position which they hold for life, do not trouble themselves much about these small matters. They are very apt rather to be disposed to make friends with the bar, and make such appointments as will be satisfactory to the bar in the different parts of their district. They become in a measure conservative and do not trouble themselves so much about these small appointments. I think this rule applies just as well to the district judges who may happen to be Democrats at the present time as it does to the circuit judges who may happen to be Democrats. I do not think either of them regards this as a very material matter, and that all of them will be more anxious to get good men, good officers who will make the discharge of their own duties easy, quiet, and comfortable, than they will be to get particular partisans of anybody. I think that applies pretty much to all of them, and arises from the nature of the office they hold.

Therefore if one or the other is to be selected I shall vote in favor of selecting the district judges, because they are the head of the bankruptcy court; but if it is to make a controversy, perhaps the better way would be to stick to the compromise which seems to have been agreed upon in the House of Representatives, and that is to provide that the registers shall be appointed on the nomination of the Chief Justice. I suppose that would work, because he would be instructed as to the right men who should be appointed in the different States by the circuit and district judges. They would probably agree in such a case upon who should be the registers, and submit the names to the Chief Justice, and he would nominate.

There is another reason why, if the appointment is to be given either to the district or the circuit judge, it should rather belong to the district judge. The circuit judge may know as much about the bar in the State in which he resides as the district judge; but where there are half a dozen States in the circuit, some of those States having two district judges, he certainly cannot be so well acquainted with the qualifications of the men and the right kind of men to appoint as the district judge of the particular district. Take, for instance, the first circuit, which includes the States of Maine, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, and New Hampshire. I dare say the circuit judge would appoint in the State of Maine perhaps as judiciously as the district judge; but I do not think he could appoint as judiciously in the other States where he does not reside and where he only goes occasionally to hold the circuit court. For that reason, also, I think it should belong to the district rather than the circuit judges. But if there is to be any contest to see whether it shall be according to the prevailing politics of the circuit judges at the West or the district judges at the East, I think we had better compromise on that important matter and have it fixed accordingly.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I rise to try and express my sense of obligation to the Senator from Maine for having stated the actual reasons which control my vote on this amendment. I should have stated them myself if I had felt at liberty to introduce political topics into the Senate; but after the voting we have had for a few days past I did not feel authorized to indulge in any such line of argument. But it is true, as is very frankly and considerably stated by the Senator from Maine, that there happens to be a judge presiding in the circuit in which I live who, at the last dates, was a Republican; and it is true that there happens to be presiding in the district a judge who, both at the last and the earliest dates which I have ever consulted, was not a Republican; and I did not like, under those circumstances, to agree to an amendment which proposed to strike out the circuit judge and put in the district judge. As I said before, I should have stated that reason in the outset if I had not felt hereafter called upon to go to some church for political discussions, and leave the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. President, I hear for the first time that party considerations enter into this provision of the bill. Certainly, if I am permitted to refer to the deliberations of the committee, I can say that no such considerations influenced them, and I speak with positive certainty that no such influence me then or can influence me ever in relation to appointments of this description. I did not know, therefore, that it was supposed, or that the fact was so, that the bill as it came from the House in this respect was the result of a compromise—a compromise founded upon some doubt as to the integrity or the ability or the party fealty of the judges of the circuit or district courts, and a greater confidence in the integrity and party fealty of the Chief Justice of the United States. But I suppose that that is one of the "existing circumstances" to which my friend from Oregon adverted.

Now, sir, in concurring with the committee in rejecting that part of the bill, as it came from the House, which required the appointments to be made upon the nomination of the Chief Justice, I was governed solely by this consideration; I thought it altogether unfit for that officer. I have no doubt whatever that he would, if the law should pass in that form, discharge the duty which would be imposed upon him with perfect integrity and with perfect fairness; but I do not think that the Chief Justice of the United States should be required to appoint inferior officers, scattered all over the Union. I should just as soon think of devolving upon him the duty of appointing the messengers of the courts or the clerks of the courts throughout the Union. As Chief Justice of the United States his duties should be confined in my opinion—and I am sure he would wish to have them so confined—to the high matters of constitutional law which are often brought before that tribunal, and to the legal questions, other than constitutional ones, which arise in disputes between parties whose cases are brought into that forum. And if this provision be retained I should consider it a degradation of the office—I have no fear that it will be so degraded by him—if in making these appointments he should be governed by any such party considerations. To be so governed is to make him a party man in the strongest sense in which that term can be used. It tends, however, he may incline against that tendency, to make him hold uneven the balance of justice; and it does what is quite as pernicious; it will create a belief in the mind of the country that the administration of that high office is more or less to depend upon party considerations.

I agreed substantially for the reasons stated by the honorable member from Vermont, that it was better to leave the appointment to the district judges; but in doing so, and in agreeing to change the bill as it came from the House in that particular, I certainly had no idea of reflecting upon the circuit judges of the United States. I did not understand my friend from Iowa as stating that that was the purpose of the committee. I understood him merely as saying that it might be so construed. It was very far from my purpose, and I am equally certain it was entirely foreign to any purpose of any member of the committee. I have comparatively little choice—I have a choice, as I have stated—whether the appointments are submitted to the district judges or to the circuit judges; but I have an insuperable objection to requiring the appointments to depend upon the nomination of the Chief Justice of the United States, both because I think it is an unfit duty to impose upon him, and which, I presume, he would be very unwilling to have imposed upon him, and because I believe that the reason for imposing it upon him, which, if the bill should pass in that form, will be considered to be the reason for imposing it upon him, is calculated very materially to diminish the influence which he ought to have in the judgment of all the country—not of a party, but of all.

However great may have been the perils through which we have passed or are now passing owing to sectional differences giving rise to party politics, I believe as I believe in my existence that the Supreme Court of the United States has never lent itself to any such considerations in the least particular. If there be a tribunal in the world, in the past or in the present, which discharges its high judicial functions from a pure sense of what the laws and the Constitution of their country require, I believe it to be the present tribunal and the past tribunal of the Supreme Court of the United States. Errors of judgment I think they have fallen into; errors upon questions of constitutional law I think they have fallen into; but that is inseparable from the fact that they are at last but men; but that any such errors, if errors they be, have been brought about by any such motive as that to which I have alluded I do not believe; and if I could believe it, or should be brought in the future to believe it, I should conclude that the destinies of our country are not to be what we should all hope.

Mr. GRIMES. I desire to say to the Senator from Maryland that I believe I did not attribute any motive whatever to the Committee on the Judiciary in proposing this amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I understood that.

Mr. POLAND. Mr. President, I desire to say a word more in reference to this matter of appointments. I do not regard it as of the very greatest consequence that the amendment which the committee have proposed to this section should be adopted, but it certainly seems to me that there would be more likelihood, more probability of our having the proper men appointed to fill these places if they are appointed by the district judge than in any other way.

These officers are perhaps about as important in rank as deputy sheriffs, and it certainly seems to me to be very small business to be belittling the office of the Chief Justice of the United States to set him to appointing deputy sheriffs or officers of that rank all over the United States. It has usually been permitted to the judges of every court to appoint their own officers. These registers are officers of the district court. They are even officers of the circuit court. Their duty is to aid in the administration of this jurisdiction that we are creating and conferring upon the district courts. I do not know personally every district judge in the United States, but I doubt very much whether there is one who will be governed in the selection of these men by any other motive than that of having the business properly conducted.

I had supposed, when I was fortunate enough to get this bill before the Senate for consideration, that this talk and scramble about appointments and about offices would be laid aside for one day at least, that we should not hear it in any discussion upon this bill; but it has come forward. Now, sir, in my own State we have a district judge, who was appointed while the Democratic party held power in this country. He was a Democrat, and a prominent Democrat; a man who stood at the head of the political organization of the Democratic party. He was chairman of the national committee of that party for some years, a prominent and active politician. The State is perhaps as strongly the other way politically as any State in the Union; but we have no fear, so far as my State is concerned, in leaving the appointment of these registers in the hands of the district judge, where it seems naturally and properly to belong.

If it was left to the judges of the circuit court instead of as the bill stands, the absurdity would not be so glaring as it seems to me to be practically devolving the appointment of these officers upon the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, who can of course personally know very few of the men who will ask to be appointed in any one of the States. He must act upon the representations of others. Although these officers are comparatively insignificant, it does not follow that there may not be a very great scramble for them. The contest for a place does not depend at all upon the importance of it. Although these places are comparatively humble in an official sense, there may be a very great number of persons who will aspire to hold them, and that the Chief Justice of the United States should be set to considering and weighing the claims of perhaps half a dozen men that he never heard of before, upon written recommendations and personal recommendations from lawyers and politicians, throughout each congressional district in the United States, seems to me to be an absolute, perfect absurdity. So far as that feature of the House bill is concerned I certainly could never consent myself to its adoption. As to the other portions of it, whether the appointment is left to the district judge or given to the judges of the circuit court, is not a matter of so very much importance, because one of those judges at least would have personal knowledge in relation to that class of persons from whom these appointments are to be made in his own district. The circuit judge would be likely to have some knowledge upon the subject; in that portion of the circuit in which he himself resided he might know as well as the district judge of that district; but it seems to me that the amendment which has been proposed by the Committee is the true, just ground upon which these appointments ought to stand.

Mr. HOWARD. Mr. President, I do not concur at all with the Senator from Vermont as to the importance and dignity of the office of register of bankruptcy provided for in this bill. If Senators will look into the bill, especially into the fourth section, it will be discovered that this office of register is one of great importance and very great responsibility. The Senator from Vermont compares it with that of a deputy sheriff, and speaks of it as being an insignificant office. I do not so regard it. According to the bill which he has reported to the Senate "no person shall be eligible" to the appointment of register "unless he be a counselor of said court or of some one of the courts of record of the State in which he resides." In addition, he is required to give bond for the faithful performance of his duty and to take an oath. His general powers are described in the fourth section, which declares:

"That every register in bankruptcy, so appointed and qualified, shall have power, and it shall be his duty to make adjudication of bankruptcy, to receive the surrender of any bankrupt, to administer oaths in all proceedings before him, to hold and preside at meetings of creditors, to take proof of debts, to make all computations of dividends, and all orders of distribution, and to furnish the assignee with a certified copy of such orders, and of the schedules of creditors and assets filed in each case, to audit and pass accounts of assignees, to grant protection, to pass the last examination of any bankrupt in cases whenever the assignee or a creditor do not oppose, and to sit in chambers and dispatch there such part of the administrative business of the court and such uncontested matters as shall be defined in general rules and orders, or as the district judge shall in any particular matter direct; and he shall also make short memoranda of his proceedings in each case in which he shall act in a docket to be kept by him for that purpose."

The office is plainly one of great importance, and it is in its very nature and functions a judicial office, one to which appointments may very properly be made by a court, and even by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States as it seems to me. I do not see any ground for the allegation of the honorable Senator from Maryland, that the appointment of such officers all over the United States, as will be the case if this bill shall pass, is any degradation to the Chief Justice of the United States; it is a matter as properly coming before him in his judicial capacity, is it not, as the appointment of a clerk of the Supreme Court or any judicial officer over whom he has control?

And these registers will be very numerous inevitably throughout the country. Through their hands in some form will doubtless pass a very large proportion of the property of the people of the United States, and in the rebel States especially I think it will turn out that these registers will have the handling in some form or other of the property of almost every man in those States; for this bill, if it shall pass and become a law, will doubtless be regarded as a bill of relief to a large portion of that community, and will operate as such, according to my ideas, far more than towards the relief of the people of the loyal States. It is a bill for the relief, if I may be allowed so to speak, of southern debtors, of men and women in the rebel States, and they will be the parties who will most readily hasten to embrace its benefits.

Now, sir, as to the appointment of these registers by the courts, so far as I am concerned, and so far as the district in which I reside is concerned, it is almost immaterial to me whether the final appointment is made by the circuit court or by the district court; but I shall feel much safer, and I think the public will generally feel much more secure, if the right of nominating the registers is placed in the hands of the Chief Justice of the United States. It will certainly give the whole proceeding an air and character of dignity and respectability which it would not possess without it. People are in the habit of looking with the highest degree of respect and reverence upon the chief judicial officer of the Government, and if that clause is retained giving to him the right of nomination it will be immaterial to me whether the word "circuit" be stricken out and the word "district" be inserted or not. I think the great security consists in placing the nomination in the hands of the Chief Justice.

Mr. HENDRICKS. On this question I vote with entire impartiality. Both the circuit and the district judge of Indiana were appointed by Mr. Lincoln and are both of the party to which I do not belong. But independently of that, I am very sorry to hear a reference to political considerations in the appointment of these registers, men appointed to discharge judicial duties. Is it possible that any Senator here wants a man to be appointed to the discharge of judicial duties so that it may be a political act on his part? Is it possible that party politics are to enter into the adjudication of these men, that one man is to be discharged because he is of one party and another not to be discharged because he is of the other party? or is the register expected to allow claims because they are presented by partisans? Is that the understanding? It is a thing I would not have thought of; it would never have occurred to my mind; but upon what principle is it? This register is to discharge part of the duties that belong to the district court, and ought he not to discharge these subordinate duties of that court in subordination to the judgment of the district judge?

Suppose he undertakes to administer the law in his district in a manner not agreeable to the judge, is he not to be removed by that judge? Who is to remove these men if upon questions of fact or questions of law their adjudications shall be such as the court disapproves? Is another court to take jurisdiction of a register's removal, and is a judge having no connection with the business that is transacted by this man to remove him? Suppose the Chief Justice should appoint him and he should allow claims that ought not to be allowed, or disallow claims that ought to be allowed, or in any other respect his judgments should be wrong. The judge of the circuit court knows nothing about it; much less does the Chief Justice know anything about it. He certainly ought to be under the control of the district judge. Every reason is in favor of that and none against it.

I believe the district judge of Indiana, Judge MacDonald, would appoint good men. I have a better opinion of him, however, than to suppose that he would pronounce every member of the Democratic party in Indiana and all the lawyers that believe in the doctrines of that party to be personally dishonest. I have not so much contempt for him as to imagine such a thing. I was anxious for his appointment because I thought he was an eminent lawyer and pure-minded man; but if I thought he was so mean as to suppose that the Democratic lawyers of Indiana were a corrupt set of scoundrels and would not discharge the duties of a little office like this honestly, I would not speak to him. I would not entertain such an opinion of the Republican lawyers of Indiana for any consideration, and I would not go to any judge asking him to appoint to offices like these upon party considerations, because I should consider myself degraded by doing it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator if he supposes that because a President or a judge makes appointments from among his own political friends, therefore he assumes that all the men in the opposite party are dishonest and disqualified for office. Does not the Senator know that every President we have ever had, in appointing supreme judges, has made appointments from among his political friends; and does not the Senator know that in those States where judges are elected they are elected from among those who have the political majority in the State? I think it is entirely unjust to assume that because these appointments are made from among the friends of the appointing power, therefore those on the other side of the political question are assumed to be dishonest or disqualified. It is human nature. The honorable Senator can stand up and profess to be entirely disinterested, entirely free from any party bias or party feeling; but every man who has had any experience knows that it is human nature for a man who has the appointing power to prefer his political friends to his political enemies, all other things being equal; and I do not know, but I should suppose from the generous nature of the honorable Senator, that he would frankly avow that he would rather prefer, as a usual thing, his political friends to his political enemies.

Mr. HENDRICKS. The gentleman's memory is not very reliable. He asks me if all Presidents have not appointed to the judicial offices of the country men of their own political party. Why, sir, one of the last acts President Johnson did at the last session was to appoint a brother Senator who was one of the leaders of this body against him, Senator Clark, to be district judge in the State of New Hampshire, a gentleman known to be a leader against him. Do you suppose that was disagreeable to me? I was very glad when that Senator failed to be endorsed by his political party at home by a reelection that the President of the United States could find it right to give him that high and honorable office, and I voted for his confirmation with the greatest pleasure in the world. That is a case in point; is it not? But I cannot go back through all the appointments that have been made. But here is a duty to be performed under the judge of the district court; and because there are a few men on some of the district benches that are not Republicans, perhaps, you will not allow them to make these appointments that properly belong to the court. If it belongs to the court, let the court appoint.

But, sir, I am not going to discuss this matter. These duties are to be discharged under the judgment of the court, and the court ought to have power to remove the officers on principle. I did not rise, however, to discuss the question, but just to express my views about carrying parties into everything. Of course

I am a very fair specimen of a party man. I never pretended anything else. There is no concealment so far as I am concerned on that point. But party politics never influence my personal relations and personal feelings. Because I differ with gentlemen of the other party, I do not believe they are all scoundrels; and I should despise myself if I did not have warm personal friends where I live among gentlemen that would not vote for me; friends who would do me a kindness, and who would believe in my integrity in the discharge of any official duty. I have been disgusted a good deal of late by seeing jurors brought into the box simply because they were party men. I want to know if the Senator from Oregon believes in that kind of business, selecting a man as a juror because he is of a particular political party.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not believe in it, but I can name a place in the United States where the Senator's political friends do adopt that expedient.

Mr. HENDRICKS. If this Senator's political friends do that, this Senator condemns it most emphatically.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Then it is not peculiar to any political party.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not care where it is done, or by whom it is done, it is a mean thing, it is a dirty thing, it is below even the dignity of party warfare and ought to disgrace the man who does it among honorable men.

Mr. WILLIAMS. We agree to all that.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I am glad the honorable Senator from Oregon agrees to all that. Upon one subject, then, we are agreed. Now, sir, this is a simple question whether in the discharge of some minor duties under the district judge, the appointment of the officers to discharge them shall be made by him. I am satisfied in my State which ever way you fix it, because it does not make any difference. I am willing to trust Mr. Justice Davis to appoint any nominee that belongs to his court; and so of Judge MacDonald, both of them gentlemen of high standing in their profession, and of integrity, as I believe.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Mr. President, while listening to the remarks of my friend from Maryland, [Mr. JOHNSON,] I concurred with his view; but on reflection it seems to me that there are advantages in having these officers appointed upon the nomination of the Chief Justice. I can see that there may be a good deal of strife for this office of register among the bar, and that the district judge may be placed in very unpleasant circumstances in being called upon to decide it, and that therefore it would be better if the nomination was made by the Chief Justice. The Chief Justice would of course confer with the district judge and not act in opposition to his views.

Then, again, in some of our Federal courts there has grown up the practice of appointing sons and nephews and brothers, which would be avoided if the appointment were made by the Chief Justice. It is a very important office, one not beneath the dignity of the Chief Justice to take into consideration. I have no doubt that everybody agrees with the remarks made by the Senator who last addressed us, that all partisan feelings should be excluded from this subject, but there are substantial reasons why it would be better that the appointment should be made by the Chief Justice, who no doubt would act with the concurrence of the district judge.

Mr. JOHNSON. I call for the yeas and nays on this question.

Mr. GRIMES. The question I believe is on striking out the word "circuit" in the second line of the third section.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, [Mr. MORRILL.] And inserting the word "district" in its place.

Mr. GRIMES. I am perfectly willing that that amendment shall be concurred in. I believe I was the one who made the objection and called for a division upon it; but I withdraw the objection. I am content that the word "district" shall be substituted for the word "circuit."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Maryland called for the yeas and nays upon the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON. I withdraw the call if the objection is not insisted upon.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question, then, is on agreeing to this amendment, reported by the Committee on the Judiciary. The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section three, lines four, five, and six, to strike out the words, "upon the nomination and recommendation of the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States," so as to read:

That it shall be the duty of the judges of the district courts of the United States within and for the several districts to appoint in each congressional district in said districts, one or more registers in bankruptcy, to assist the judge of the district court in the performance of his duties under this act.

Mr. GRIMES. That amendment I hope will not be concurred in.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I should like to inquire how that would operate; whether it is sufficiently expressed: "shall be made by the district judge upon the nomination." Does that mean that the nomination is to be conclusive, and that when that nomination is made the district judge is to appoint?

Mr. JOHNSON. Certainly it does.

Mr. POLAND. As the inquiry is directed to me, I will state that it was not drawn by me. It is a question upon the construction of the language. My honorable friend from Maine would be a better judge of that than I should be myself. It seems to me that it is substantially giving the appointment to the Chief Justice of the United States.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no objection to that.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 14, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Dixon, Doolittle, Edmunds, Foster, Harris, Henderson, Hendricks, Johnson, Norton, Patterson, Poland, Sherman, and Wiley—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Fessenden, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Howard, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Ramsey, Sprague, Sumner, Wade, Williams, and Wilson—16.

ABSENT—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Cowan, Cragin, Creswell, Davis, Fogg, Guthrie, McDougall, Nesmith, Nye, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Saulsbury, Stewart, Trumbull, Van Winkle, and Yates—22.

So the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was to strike out the following clause in section three, lines eight, nine, ten, eleven, and twelve:

In case of disagreement between the judges of said court as to such appointments, or in case of vacancy in the office of district judge, the presiding judge of the circuit court shall determine the number of appointments to be made, and make such appointments.

Mr. POLAND. This amendment must be made of course. This portion of the section went upon the ground that this appointment was to be committed to two persons, and provided in case of difference who should have the casting vote, the choice; but inasmuch as we have confined it to one, of course this portion must be struck out.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It struck me on the reading that that clause referred to the number of appointments instead of the appointees. "In case of disagreement between the judges of said court as to such appointments." Does not that apply to the number of appointments to be made?

Mr. POLAND. It is not material to what it does refer. This whole matter is now left to a single judge instead of two, and therefore there is no necessity for any provision about a difference of opinion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Of course it should go out, then.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in section five, to insert after "court," in line ten, the words "in accordance with the rules prescribed under the tenth section of this act;" so as to make the section read:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the judge of the district court may direct a register to attend at any place within the district for the purpose of hearing such voluntary applications under this act as may not be opposed, of attending any meeting of creditors or receiving any proof of debts, and generally for the prosecution of any bankruptcy or other proceedings under this act; and the traveling and incidental expenses of such register, and of any clerk or other officer attending him, incurred in so acting, shall be settled by said court in accordance with the rules prescribed under the tenth section of this act, and paid out of the assets of the estate in respect of which such register has so acted; or if there be no such assets, or if the assets shall be insufficient, then such expenses shall form a part of the costs, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. In the twenty-fifth line of this same section there is an amendment which ought to be made to make it conform to the present condition of the bill in relation to the appointment of these registers. It now reads: "Such register shall be subject to removal by the judges of the circuit court." It should read, "judge of the district court."

Mr. HOWARD. How will it read then?

Mr. POLAND. "Such register shall be subject to removal by the judge of the district court," &c. I move that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made in order to make the bill consistent with what has previously been done.

The next amendment was in section ten, line three, to strike out the words "five commissioners" and insert "any two of the associate justices of the Supreme Court;" and in line four to strike out "appointed" and insert "selection;" so as to read:

Sec. 10. And be it further enacted, That the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, with the assistance of any two of the associate justices of the Supreme Court, to be selected by said justice, and subject to the provisions of this act, shall frame general orders for the following purposes, &c.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. There are two or three corrections necessary in order to make this section correspond with the amendment that has been made. I move in line twenty-six after the word "time," to strike out the words "when approved by the Justice of the Supreme Court so designated;" in line twenty-eight to add the letter "g" to the word "justice;" and to strike out all after the word "approve" in the twenty-ninth line, in the following words:

The district judges shall be eligible to act as such commissioners. No pay or compensation shall be allowed to such commissioners for services under this section.

So that that portion of the section will read:

After such general orders shall have been so framed, they, or any of them, may be rescinded or varied, and other general orders may be framed in manner aforesaid, and all such general orders so framed shall, from time to time, be reported to Congress, with such suggestions as said justices may approve.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. POLAND. The word "approve" in the twenty-ninth line, the last word in that section, should be stricken out, and the words "think proper" substituted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That amendment will be made, as it is merely a verbal correction.

The next amendment was in section fourteen, to strike out the following clause in lines twenty-seven, twenty-eight, twenty-nine, thirty, thirty-one, thirty-two, and thirty-three:

"And such other property not included in the foregoing exceptions as is exempted from levy and sale upon execution by the laws of the State in which the bankrupt has his domicile at the time of the commencement of the proceedings in bankruptcy, to an amount not exceeding that allowed by such State exemption laws in force in the year 1864;" so as to make the first proviso to that section read:

Provided, however, That there shall be excepted from the operation of the provisions of this section the necessary household and kitchen furniture, and such other articles and necessities of such bankrupt as the said assignee shall designate and set apart, having reference in the amount to the family, condition, and circumstances of the bankrupt, but altogether not to exceed in value, in any case the sum of $500; and also the wearing apparel of such bankrupt and that of his wife and children, and the uniform, arms, and equipments of any person who is or has been a soldier in the militia or in the service of the United States; and such other property as now is, or hereafter shall be, exempted from attachment, or seizure, or levy on execution by the laws of the United States.

Mr. POLAND. This amendment, although proposed by the committee, was not reported by the unanimous vote of the committee, but by a majority, and although the bill was reported from the committee by myself, I did not, in committee, concur in this amendment. I do not myself think that the amendment should be adopted. I am very certain that if it is adopted it will very seriously jeopardize the passage; but if it is required that it should be adopted in order to make the system that this bill establishes a uniform system of bankruptcy within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, then of course we must adopt it, whatever effect it may have upon the fate of the bill.

We all understand that the provisions under the laws of the different States in relation to exemptions from attachment and execution, both of real and personal—estate homestead laws as they are termed as applied to real estate—vary in the different States. Nearly all, and I do not know but quite all, the New England States have now an existing homestead law. The New England rule in reference to homesteads is $500—a homestead not exceeding in value $500; in the State of New York it is $1,000. In some of the western States they exempt a certain number of acres of land. In the Pacific States I believe they go by value, but have a still higher one than we have in New England or even in New York.

The general wisdom of these homestead laws as passed by the different States is not questioned by anybody; but it is said that when we come to administer upon the estates of insolvent and bankrupt debtors, to make a national system as applied to that subject, we are not at liberty to leave any of these State laws in force in relation to these exemptions; that we must cut them all up, or else, if we leave any exemption at all, we must make one of our own and one that shall be uniform in the several States. It does not appear to me to be necessary to do any such thing; I think we may well enough leave in force all the laws of the various States protecting such necessary portion of the insolvent's property as is necessary for the use of his family, as has been declared by the several States; that we do not thereby make an inequality, preventing the system of bankruptcy that we thereby establish from being "uniform," in the sense of the Constitution and the laws. If we leave this section to stand as it was passed by the House, and leave these State exemptions to remain and be operative still, notwithstanding the passage of this bankrupt law, we do just this: we lay hold upon all the property of insolvents and bankrupts in all the States that by the existing laws is liable to the payment of their debts; and that is a uniform rule, a uniform law throughout the entire Government, throughout every State; and because in consequence of the difference in the State laws there may be some inequality, it is nothing more than what happens in a great variety of instances under this and under the preceding laws.

Quite a notable example of this arose under the law that was passed in 1841. In all the New England States, I believe, we have a proceeding for attaching property upon mesne process. When a man commences a suit he prays out a writ and he goes and seizes property enough to secure the payment of his debt if he recovers judgment finally—what we call an attachment lien. It hardly exists anywhere out of New England, I believe, in the United States. Such a lien could not exist under the law of any other State. Under the bankrupt law that was passed in 1841 existing liens upon property were to stand against any title acquired by the assignee under that law. A very great controversy arose in the State of New Hampshire whether an attachment lien, where a creditor had brought suit and attached property prior to the commencement of proceedings in bankruptcy, whether that was a lien within the meaning of the bankrupt law; and a very notable controversy—notable as among lawyers—sprang up between Judge Parker, the chief justice of New Hampshire, and Judge Story, the circuit judge of that district; Judge Story insisting that this lien was not available, and Judge Parker insisting that it was. The controversy resulted in Judge Parker's view being sustained. Now, if no statute lien by the laws of the State could be upheld unless a similar statute lien could be upheld throughout the entire country, then that must have gone by, because it was only in New England that that kind of statute law existed.

As I said to begin with, Mr. President, the adoption of this amendment will undoubtedly seriously jeopardize the fate of this bill; and I state this as a reason for asking every Senator to examine it with great care, and to be quite certain that the retention of this clause will render the bankrupt system which we are about to inaugurate so uniform as to be unavailing in consequence of allowing these homestead exemptions to remain untouched by our bankrupt law before they adopt the amendment reported by the committee.

Mr. HOWARD. I move that the Senate adjourn. I want time to consider this subject. The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, January 19, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

ALEXANDER H. COFFROTH.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask unanimous consent to submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Alexander H. Coffroth the amount of increased pay of member of this House provided by law, from the commencement of the Thirty-Ninth Congress to the period when he ceased to be a member.

Mr. KOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, there is a legal question involved in this resolution, and I move to refer it to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WOODBRIDGE. There is another question of that kind before the Committee on the Judiciary, and I hope it will be referred to that committee.

The resolution was accordingly so referred.

Subsequently Mr. BENJAMIN entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred.

PUBLICATION OF CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the publication of the Congressional Globe in the form and style of the debates of the British Parliament.

DAKOTA GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a memorial of the Legislature of the Territory of Dakota relative to a geological survey of the Black Hill country; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

FIRE AND MARINE INSURANCE COMPANY.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. This being private bill day, the first business in the morning hour is the consideration of Senate bill No. 98, to incorporate the Metropolitan Fire and Marine Insurance Company of the District of Columbia; which was reported from the Committee for the District of Columbia, and pending at the expiration of the morning hour on yesterday.

Mr. MERCUR. I move to further amend the bill by adding to section five the following: Said corporation shall have power to reinsure any risk which may be taken by them or any part thereof, in the discretion of the officers or directors of the company.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to offer one or two amendments to this bill before it is put upon its passage. In the reading of the bill yesterday I noticed that it provides that no larger dividends than six per cent. shall be declared unless the surplus profits of the company shall exceed $20,000. The bill, however, does not restrict the company from declaring a dividend at any time of six per cent. or less, though they may have no profits at all. Now, it will be readily perceived by members that under this provision this company may divide the capital stock up in dividends when there is no surplus of profits from which to pay dividends. In my opinion such a provision as that ought not to be allowed to go into any bill of this character, for it is perfectly ruinous, allowing the stockholders or directors for the stockholders to do that which certainly has never been allowed to be done in this country. Now, I would suggest to the gentleman who has charge of the bill [Mr. MERCUR] that it should be so amended that no dividends shall be declared unless the company shall have on hand at the time a certain amount of surplus profits.

Mr. MERCUR. I have no objection to such an amendment.

Mr. PRICE. Then I move to amend the bill in the section providing for the declaration of dividends so as to provide that no dividends shall be declared unless the company shall have on hand at least $20,000 of net profits.

Mr. DAVIS. I would suggest to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] that he better frame his amendment so as to provide that no dividends shall be declared by the company except from the profits of the company.

Mr. PRICE. I think the amendment I have suggested will cover the whole ground. I desire to provide that no dividends shall be declared unless the company shall be in possession of at least $20,000 of net profits.

Mr. DAVIS. The gentleman will excuse me, I hope, if I still urge upon his attention the fact that the language which he has employed does not fully accomplish the purpose he states he has in view. According to the amendment which the gentleman suggests the company are not to declare any dividends of any amount unless they have at least $20,000 of net profits on hand. But there is nothing to prevent the company, after they shall have accumulated $20,000 of net profits, from going on and making their dividends from the capital. I suppose the purpose of the gentleman is to have the dividends declared from the profits, and the profits alone.

Mr. PRICE. That is what I seek to accomplish.

Mr. DAVIS. The language employed by the gentleman in his amendment does not do that.

Mr. PRICE. My intention is that the company, after the declaration of any dividends, shall have on hand at least $20,000 of net profits; that no declaration of dividends shall reduce the surplus profits below that amount.

Mr. DAVIS. I would suggest to the gentleman to modify his amendment so that it shall provide that no dividends shall be declared except from the profits of the company, nor unless there shall be a surplus of at least $20,000 net profits after the payment of the dividend.

Mr. PRICE. I will accept that modification.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I wish to make another suggestion. If I understood the bill correctly as it was read, it provides that any number of directors may be a quorum for the transaction of business. Now, I do not know whether the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MERCUR] has noticed that provision of the bill; but he must see at once the propriety of making it read that any number not less than so many, which ought to be not less than one-half, shall constitute a quorum to transact business.

Mr. MERCUR. The bill provides that the directors shall determine what number of their body shall constitute a quorum.

Mr. PRICE. Precisely; and they may determine that one member shall constitute a quorum, and thus place the entire business of the company under the control of one man, which would be ruinous to the interests of the company and of the public. I move to amend by inserting the words "not less than two thirds of the entire number."

Mr. MERCUR. I will agree to an amendment saying "one half."

Mr. PRICE. Very well; I will move that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then read the third time.

The question was upon the passage of the bill.

Mr. PAINE. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the bill be laid on the table.

On the motion there were—yeas 46, nays 30; no quorum voting.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 69, nays 54, not voting 68; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Benjamin, Boutwell, Brandegee, Brownell, Campbell, Chanler, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Dawes, Deming, Donnelly, Eldridge, Eliot, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grinnell, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Henderson, Hill, Hise, Hooper, Demas Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Julian, Kerr, Ketcham, Longyear, Marston, Melndoe, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Niblack, Nicholson, Orth, Paine, Plants, Price, Samuel J. Randall, Rogers, Rollins, Ross, Sawyer, Shehabarger, Sloan, Stevens, Stokes, Taber, Thornton, Trimble, Upton, Van Arman, Burt Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, and James F. Wilson—69.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Baldwin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boyer, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cooper, Davis, Dawson, Deftrees, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Ferry, Griswold, Hart, Hayes, Higby, Holmes, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jencks, Kelley, Kelso, Koontz, Kuykendall, Ladin, Leftwich, Marshall, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McKee, Meruer, Mercer, Miller, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Ritter, Sitgreaves, Spaulding, Nelson Taylor, Trowbridge, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—54.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baxter, Beaman, Bergen, Blow, Broomall, Buckland, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Culver, Darling, Delano, Denison, Dumont, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Finck, Harris, Hawkins, Hogan, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, Johnson, Jones, Knasson, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Lynch, McCullough, Morris, Myers, Newell, Neill, O'Neill, Phelps, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rousseau, Schenck, Scofield, Shanklin, Starr, Stillwell, Strouse, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Whaley, Williams, Winfield, and Wright—68.

So the bill was laid on the table.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The time allowed to the Committee for the District of Columbia for private business has expired. The call of committees for private business will now be resumed where it was arrested on the 12th instant.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 453) entitled "An act to regulate the tenure of offices," in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. COBB, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a bill (S. No. 311) entitled "An act for the relief of James Pool;" whereupon the Speaker signed the same.

RUFUS C. SPALDING.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, a bill (H. R. No. 843) for the relief of Rufus C. Spaulding, a paymaster in the United States Navy.

The bill, which was read, proposes to authorize and require the Secretary of the Treasury, in adjusting the accounts of Rufus C. Spaulding, as paymaster in the Navy of the United States, to credit Spaulding with $14,563 73, being the amount stolen from the quartermaster's safe at the naval station at Mound City, Illinois, on the night of December 21, 1865; which sum stands charged to his account as paymaster.

Mr. DRIGGS. I would like to hear some explanation of this bill.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. It appears from the evidence before the committee that Paymaster Spaulding was ordered to Mound City, Illinois, and entered upon the discharge of his duties as paymaster of that station on the 23d of February, 1865. At that time there were connected with said station a fleet paymaster, a purchasing paymaster and navy agent, a paymaster in charge of provisions and clothing, and paymaster of the receiving ship, making in all five paymasters, including Paymaster Spaulding. In process of time the duties performed by all these paymasters were cast upon Paymaster Spaulding alone, and he continued to perform them till October, 1865. On the 21st of August, 1865, finding his duties too onerous, Paymaster Spaulding, with the approbation of his commanding officer, Commodore J. W. Livingston, applied to the Navy Department at Washington for an assistant. On the 6th day of October, 1865, Acting Assistant Paymaster J. S. Harvey, a bonded officer of the Navy, reported for duty, by order of the Department, to Paymaster Spaulding at Mound City, and was by him placed in charge of the office and the accounts of the station.

On the 21st of December, 1865, Paymaster Spaulding had received at that station, from sales of Government property and other sources, nearly three million dollars. This money was deposited in the national banks at Cairo, some eight miles from Mound City.

On the night of the 21st of December, 1865, before alluded to, there was in the possession of Paymaster Spaulding at Mound City $54,000. That money was left in charge of Paymaster Harvey, sent out by the Navy Department to assist Paymaster Spaulding, in whose charge also the keys of the safe were when this money was taken. The keys of that safe Paymaster Harvey placed in his private desk, locked with his own key, which he put inside of his pocket. During the night the premises were entered by some person unknown, and the amount of money in the safe, about fifty-four thousand dollars, was abstracted. On sweeping out the room the following morning the porter found a parcel of money amounting to $39,700, leaving about fourteen thousand dollars missing, which had been stolen and carried away. Paymaster Spaulding immediately asked Commodore Schenck, in charge of the station, that there should be an investigation into the loss of this money, and the responsibility of the person upon whom the custody of the money devolved. That examination was made, and subsequently a court of inquiry, at the request of Commodore Schenck, was ordered by the Navy Department, which court investigated the loss and reported that Paymaster Spaulding was in no manner to blame in the premises.

It appears in the testimony before the committee that Paymaster Spaulding was a man of integrity and entire competency for the situation. The person immediately responsible was a bonded officer, sent by the Navy Department and placed under him. In the opinion of the committee and of the court of inquiry and the Fourth Auditor of the Treasury no responsibility attached to Paymaster Spaulding in the premises, but belonged to Paymaster Harvey, his assistant. In support of this it may be stated that the Navy Department has recognized the ability and integrity of Paymaster Spaulding since then by appointing him to an important and responsible position, in which he is at present serving.

But, sir, there is no law which will permit the Fourth Auditor to relieve Paymaster Spaulding, and therefore it becomes necessary that Congress shall pass an act for his relief; and such an act is the one proposed in the pending bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to know the facts concerning the leaving of the safe-keys in a desk in the same room. I think we ought to have a more particular statement than the gentleman has yet given.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. As I have stated already, Paymaster Harvey was sent out by the Navy Department to be the assistant of Paymaster Spaulding. Paymaster Harvey himself was a bonded officer of the Government, and responsible for the correct discharge of his duties. He had charge of this small sum at Mound City. I may say this sum of $54,000, which I call a small sum, was small in comparison with the amount in the custody of Paymaster Spaulding. He had $475,000 at Cairo and other places of safe keeping. The disbursements at Mound City amounted to from twenty to fifty thousand dollars a day, and therefore he had at Mound City the sum of $54,000, and that at the time of the robbery was in the possession of Paymaster Harvey, who made payments from the safe. He had the keys of the safe, and put them into his own desk.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether the committee considered this question: whether the relief proposed to be extended to Paymaster Spaulding will not also extend to Paymaster Harvey; and whether it is the intention of the committee to relieve Paymaster Harvey as well as Paymaster Spaulding.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I will answer the gentleman by saying it is not the intention of the committee anybody should be relieved from responsibility under this bill except Paymaster Spaulding. It appears from the evidence in the case that Paymaster Spaulding was not responsible, and that Paymaster Harvey will be left to settle his own accounts as well as he may.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Paymaster Spaulding is held responsible because Paymaster Harvey was acting under his orders. Paymaster Spaulding, as I understand the case, in consequence becomes responsible to the Government for the loss of this property, and that responsibility will not attach to Paymaster Harvey except through Paymaster Spaulding. Hence in relieving Paymaster Spaulding we relieve Paymaster Harvey, who was negligent in the discharge of his duties in leaving the keys of a safe containing $54,000 in a desk in his office, so any person could take it, as some person did.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I reply to the gentleman by saying that the statement would undoubtedly be true if Harvey had simply been the clerk of Paymaster Spaulding. But the fact was that Harvey was himself assistant paymaster in the Navy and a bonded officer, responsible to the Government for the proper discharge of his duty.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the responsibility then rests upon Paymaster Harvey, I do not see the necessity of relieving Paymaster Spaulding. But if the responsibility is upon Paymaster Spaulding, and it is necessary to relieve him, then it occurs to me this may extend to Paymaster Harvey.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. In answer to that I will state that the custom of the Navy Department is to charge all the money sent to the chief paymaster in charge. Paymaster Spaulding was there in charge; the accounts were opened with him alone before this assistant was sent to him. The assistant went to him by the Department, but went in the capacity of a bonded officer. I will state to the gentleman and to the House that the Navy Department have relieved Paymaster Spaulding, as far as it was in their power, and that the additional responsibility under which he is held is merely technical, but still of a character that Congress should be asked to relieve. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.]

Mr. SCHENCK. Having had some acquaintance with the Department, and having had a special opportunity to know something about this matter, I will say a word about it. My brother, being in command at the naval station at the time, had correspondence with me in relation to the misfortune that had befallen this young gentleman, Paymaster Spalding. This led me to inquire into the facts, and the result of it, I may say in a word, is a conviction that this bill for his relief ought to pass. And with the utmost respect for the Department and for the gentlemen who may have been members of the court which investigated the case, I must say that it was a most extraordinary finding that they should have implicated Paymaster Spalding upon all the facts before them.

Now, the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] as has been remarked by the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs, entirely misapprehended him when he put the relation between Spalding and Harvey as if it were a relation between principal and clerk or agent employed by himself. Harvey was himself an assistant paymaster in the Navy, ordered by the Department to report at Mound City to the officer in command there, to serve as an assistant to Spalding. But he is or was himself a bonded officer, and Spalding had nothing to do with his selection. He was, therefore, no more responsible for the acts of Harvey than I am responsible as a Representative here for the action of my friend from Iowa. It is true that Spalding ranked him, and he being the assistant of Spalding must have got his orders through him; but he was like Spalding himself a paymaster, holding a commission, having given bonds and being liable for his acts when ordered to serve as such assistant. Spalding had no more control over the selection and knew no more who was to be sent to him as his assistant than you or I. Nor had he a right to object to Harvey. Harvey went there under the order of the Navy Department, and acted upon his responsibility as a bonded officer, and it was not in the power of Spalding either to select or to reject him, but he had to take whatever officer was sent by the Department.

Now, what is the proof in this state of facts? Why, that Spalding was performing not only duties at the naval station as paymaster, but acting as paymaster for a receiving ship and in various other capacities, which led him away from time to time from the yard. In his absence there was no one who could act for him except a second officer of the staff. The other paymaster with him was necessarily intrusted, therefore, with the charge of the safe containing whatever money had been placed on deposit there. The keys were necessarily intrusted to this officer, who was sent there as assistant paymaster. The proof submitted on this subject in the first inquiry that was made, when the whole matter was fresh with all the facts, entirely exonerated Paymaster Spalding and threw the blame on Harvey. I desire only to add that I think there might be a propriety perhaps in suggesting to the gentleman from Indiana and to the chairman of the committee of inserting a clause in this bill that it should not be so construed as to exempt Harvey from any personal liability.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. The gentleman can move that amendment.

Mr. SCHENCK. I will do so, but I do not wish to be understood as stating that even Paymaster Harvey should be responsible for the loss of this money. But if anybody should be held responsible it should be Harvey. I move to amend the bill by adding the words "that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to exempt from official or personal liability upon his bond Assistant Paymaster Harvey."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. SPALDING. I ask to be excused from voting on this bill.

No objection was made, and Mr. SPALDING was accordingly excused from voting.

The bill was then passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JOSEPH P. FYFFE.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, with a substitute, House bill No. 140, to restore Lieutenant Joseph Fyffe to his grade in active service in the Navy.

The substitute was read. It authorizes the President of the United States to nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Lieutenant Joseph P. Fyffe to the active list of the Navy, and to restore him to the rank to which he may be entitled therein.

The substitute was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

S. L. BREESE.

Mr. BRANDEGEE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back House joint resolution No. 216, for the restoration of Lieutenant Commander S. L. Breesee, United States Navy, to the active list from the retired list.

The joint resolution was read. It authorizes the President of the United States to nominate and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate to appoint, Lieutenant Commander S. L. Breesee to the active list of the Navy, with the rank to which he may be entitled thereon.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BRANDEGEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAUL S. FORBES.

Mr. KELLEY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back, with amendments, Senate joint resolution No. 99, for the relief of Paul S. Forbes, under his contract with the Navy Department for building and furnishing the steam screw sloop-of-war Idaho.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Navy, as in his judgment he deems best, either to accept the steam screw sloop-of-war Idaho of the contractor, Paul S. Forbes, at the contract price of $600,000, or to transfer the said sloop to said contractor, on the latter giving bond with good and sufficient security, to be approved by the Secretary of the Navy, to refund to the Department within six months of the date of such transfer all advances of money made by Government on account of the construction and equipment of said vessel.

The committee recommend that the bill be so amended as to instruct the Secretary of the Navy to accept the steam screw sloop-of-war Idaho from the contractor, Paul S. Forbes, at the contract price of $600,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand that the amendment recommended by the Committee on Naval Affairs proposes to take away from the Secretary of the Navy all discretion in this matter, and directly instructs him to accept this vessel and pay the contract price.

Mr. KELLEY. That is what the committee propose.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the amendments of the committee will not be agreed to by the House.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not know that I can more briefly and clearly state the facts involved in this case than by asking that the petition of Mr. Forbes be read.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has expired, and this bill will go over to the morning hour of the next private bill day.

ENGINEER CONTRACTS FOR 1866.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting in compliance with the act of April 21, 1868, a list of the contracts made by the officers of the engineer department during the year 1866; which was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

PATAPSCO SHIP-CHANNEL.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the House of January 8, 1867, a report by the chief of engineers relative to the ship-channel of the Patapsco river; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

AFFAIRS IN UTAH.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, transmitting, in answer to a resolution of the House of January 8, 1867, reports of the tours of inspection made by General Rushing and General Hazen; which, with the accompanying documents, was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

TENURE OF OFFICE.

Mr. HALE. I ask unanimous consent that a bill now on the Speaker's table be ordered to be printed; I refer to Senate bill No. 453, to regulate the tenure of offices.

No objection being made, the bill was accordingly ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Would it be in order at this time to move the reference of that bill to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 511) for the relief of Mrs. Mary E. Finney, widow of first lieutenant Solon H. Finney, late of the sixth regiment Michigan cavalry; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

MILITARY ROAD.

Mr. PAINE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act granting land to the States of Michigan and Wisconsin to aid in the construction of a military road from Fort Wilkins, Copper Harbor, Keweenaw county, in the State of Michigan, to Fort Howard, Green bay, in the State of Wisconsin," approved March 3, 1863; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

TRADE-MARKS.

Mr. MOORHEAD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill relating to trade-marks; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Patents.

GEORGE W. FISH.

Mr. BANKS. I desire unanimous consent to move that the Committee of Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (S. No. 446) for the relief of George W. Fish, and that the bill be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I would like to hear the bill read, so that we may determine to which committee it should properly go.

Mr. BANKS. The Committee on Foreign Affairs has had the subject under consideration.

The bill, which was read, proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to George W. Fish $1,825 04, in full pay for consular services as United States consul at Ning Po, China, and for exchange due him.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. This bill should properly go to the Committee on Commerce; but I will not object to the proposition of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS.]

There being no objection, the motion of Mr. BANKS was agreed to.

BOUNTIES OF CALIFORNIA TROOPS.

Mr. BIDWELL, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the propriety and justice of securing to the troops raised in California during the late rebellion, who enlisted for three years or during the war, but who were honorably discharged, by reason of the termination of the war, before their term of service had expired, the bounties promised to them at the time of their enlistment; and that the committee have leave to report at any time by bill or otherwise.

The SPEAKER. The clause of this resolution authorizing the Committee on Military Affairs to report at any time, requires unanimous consent for its adoption.

Mr. GRINNELL. I object to that clause.

Mr. BIDWELL. I modify the resolution by striking out that clause.

The resolution, as modified, was adopted.

PAGE'S PICTURE OF FARRAGUT.

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the joint Committee on the Library be instructed to inquire into the expediency of purchasing Page's picture of Admiral Farragut, now hanging in the Rotunda of the Capitol, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The House then resumed the consideration of House bill No. 543, to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights.

Mr. SPALDING. Mr. Speaker, I desire to say that I am now, as I have been for some months past, of the opinion that if the constitutional amendment should not be accepted by the disloyal States it would become the duty of Congress to intervene, and so legislate as to reconstruct those rebellious communities upon the votes of their loyal citizens without respect to class or color. But, sir, if the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to this bill should be adopted and become a law, it will, it seems to me, be found defective in this important particular; that it does not afford any protection to that loyal class of the inhabitants of those communities who are to perform these high functions. Why, sir, these colored men who are now recognized by the Government as possessing the rights of freemen, and who are to be called upon to assert the elective franchise, are to be in jeopardy of being shot down like so many dogs when they attempt to visit the polls. Now, I propose to have that class of citizens armed with power for their protection; and to that end I desire to offer an amendment, which I hope my friend from Pennsylvania will accept. It is to add a new section, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, and until said States in rebellion shall be admitted to representation in Congress as aforesaid, the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus shall be suspended in Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Texas, Alabama, Louisiana, Mississippi, and Arkansas; and said districts of country are hereby placed under martial law for and during the whole term aforesaid.

Mr. STEVENS. I think that is all right. I accept it as a modification of my amendment.

Mr. KOONTZ. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to examine in detail the bill now under discussion, but will occupy a portion of the time allotted me in discussing the general principles involved therein. When the late civil war closed with the overthrow of the military power of the southern confederacy the first questions that were presented to the consideration of the loyal people of the country were, what penalties shall be imposed upon the persons who brought so direful a calamity upon the nation? and what shall be done to restore civil governments to those communities, and once more bring them into harmonious action with the General Government? For over four years the nation had engaged in a desperate struggle for its life. Ten States had by solemn legislative enactment separated the ties that bound them to the Union, organized a separate government, seized the forts, arsenals, navy-yards, mints, custom-houses, and other property of the Government, raised large armies and waged one of the fiercest wars known in history, to establish their independence. After an immense expenditure of blood and treasure the whole fabric of treason fell crumbling to the earth, and the great fact established thereby was the ability of the nation to maintain itself against domestic foes.

A stern sense of justice demanded that some punishment should be inflicted upon the guilty criminals who had lighted the fires of civil war, desolated so large a portion of our fair land, and robbed the country in mourning for the precious dead whose lives had been sacrificed through their mad ambition. At the same time a proper regard for the future peace and security of the country required that there should be some conditions imposed upon them before they could again be permitted to participate in the privileges pertaining to the true and loyal people of the country. These things were looked for by the friends of the Government, not through a spirit of hatred or revenge toward the rebels, but because they were consistent with not only the fundamental law of the land but with that great principle of self-preservation which lies at the foundation of all Governments, and belongs to nations as well as to individuals. The crime of treason is defined by the Constitution as follows:

"Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."—Article 3, section 3.

And the punishment provided therefor is, by act of Congress, 30th April, 1790, as follows:

"If any person owing allegiance to the United States of America shall levy war against them, or shall adhere to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort, within the United States or elsewhere, and shall be thereof convicted, on confession in open court, or on the testimony of two witnesses to the same overt act of the treason whereof he or they shall stand indicted, such person or persons shall be adjudged guilty of treason against the United States, and shall suffer death."

It requires no argument here to prove that they were guilty of this monstrous crime. That they waged a fierce and relentless war against the United States we have but to look at the numberless widows and orphans, who remind us that three hundred thousand precious lives were lost to resist their attacks upon the Government; and to remember that a national debt of $3,000,000,000, which will tax the energies of our people for generations to come, was contracted to overthrow the work of treason. Manifestly guilty, therefore, of this high crime it would have only been in accordance with the dictates of justice had they suffered its penalty. The principle that there must be punishment for crime pervades both human and divine law, and as they were guilty of the very highest crime known to the law, as well as of all the crimes that follow in the train of civil war, it was but a reasonable expectation on the part of the loyal people that they should expiate their crimes by suffering the penalties of the law. I do not claim, nor do I believe it to be the sense of the people, that these plain provisions of the law should have been enforced upon the great mass who were deluded into the ranks of treason; but I do most sincerely believe it to be the deliberate judgment of the great body of the American people that the guilty leaders ought to have suffered condign punishment. Instead, however, of carrying out his previous threats that "traitors must be punished," the accidental occupant of the White House showers upon them executive clemency, and instead of "treason being made odious" it basks in the smiles of presidential favor. Think of Alexander H. Stephens, the vice president of the rebel confederacy, with the pardon of Andrew Johnson in one hand and a commission from the State of Georgia in the other, waiting for "my policy" to be carried out to take his seat as a Senator in the Senate of the United States, and you have a striking illustration of the way in which the highest crime against the nation has been dealt with. Treason vanquished upon the battle-field has succeeded through the treachery of Andrew Johnson in escaping the blows of justice. It remains for the Congress of the United States to see to it that the people are not robbed of the fruits of the great victory won by the sword; and that before these communities can be restored to their former position they must comply with such conditions as may be deemed necessary for the future peace of the country.

In a Government where there is the widest latitude given to the expression of individual opinion, and where opinion is formed into law through the instrumentality of the ballot-box, it is but natural that there should be great diversity of sentiment upon a question so important as that of deciding upon the true relation of those States to the Government which they had attempted to destroy and whose authority they were compelled to acknowledge after a bloody and destructive war. The public sentiment of the country is divided upon this question. Upon the one side are the whole of the people lately in rebellion, that entire class of people in the North who, if they did not sympathize with rebellion, constantly opposed every measure used for its overthrow, together with a few renegade Unionists, among whom is the President of the United States. On the other side are the truly loyal men of the South, both white and black, and that great and patriotic body of people in the North who were true to the Government through its long and trying struggle with red-handed treason. The sentiments of the people upon this question began to be developed with the events immediately following the overthrow of the rebellion, and have continued to be molded by successive events until now, when they have assumed a decided form, and are expressed either in advocacy of, or bitter hostility to, what is known as the President's policy of reconstruction.

When Andrew Johnson was elevated to the Presidency through the assassination of Abraham Lincoln the Thirty-Eighth Congress had expired by constitutional limitation. Without summoning together the legislative branch of the Government he at once began the work of reconstruction. He appointed provisional governors for these States, directed the calling of conventions in them for the purpose of starting the machinery of State government, demanded from them compliance with certain conditions which he imposed, and then pronounced them in a fit condition to be admitted into the Union, provided they sent loyal representatives to Congress. Before discussing the policy of the President relative to the admission of the representatives from the States lately in rebellion, permit me to say, sir, that, in my judgment, since the formation of this Government there never was a more glaring and notorious usurpation of power than that committed by Andrew Johnson in his attempt to direct the work of reconstruction. The most important question that ever came before the American people for consideration and action was that of the adjustment of the difficulties growing out of the war. The people in ten States had for four years been in rebellion against the constituted authorities of the country, a vast amount of blood and treasure was expended on both sides, the passions and prejudices of the people were excited to a degree common only to such great conflicts; in short, the throes of one of the mightiest revolutions ever enacted in the great drama of human life had developed such a condition of public affairs as required the combined efforts and the collective skill and wisdom of all the departments of the Government.

And yet in the midst of this condition of things Andrew Johnson—one man, and a rash, obstinate, impulsive man at that, in a Government where the people rule through their representatives, and under a Constitution which expressly defines the powers and limits the duties of the Chief Magistrate, whose duty it is to execute the laws, and who has no part in making them except to make suggestions to Congress from time to time and to interpose his veto in such matters as he may see proper—assumed the direction and control of the most momentous questions that may ever occur in the life of this nation. His work of restoration was therefore a work of usurpation, wholly unwarranted and unauthorized by the Constitution. But his plan for the readmission of the rebel States was as wrong as his assumption of jurisdiction over the question was illegal and unconstitutional. What was it, and what is it still? It is briefly this: that the act of secession on the part of those States being illegal, and the rebellion having been put down, the people in those States occupy the same position they did before the war, and are at once entitled to immediate representation in the Congress of the United States. And in vindication of this position we are triumphantly asked by the President and his supporters, Did you not say that a State cannot secede; that you were only fighting to preserve the Union? And now, having succeeded in overthrowing the rebellion, you are not willing to have the Union, but insist on its disruption. True, we did say and still believe that a State cannot secede, and that we were contending solely for the preservation of the Union, and thus far we shall have no difference of opinion with you; but as to the question whether States that have rebelled, set up a foreign government, tried to destroy the old Government, waged a wicked war, and been vanquished after a long and bloody struggle, are entitled to stand precisely where they did before the war, and participate in the Government without any limitation or restriction imposed upon them, we do differ most widely.

It is contended by the supporters of the President's policy that this is a government of States, and that as no State has a right to secede that it cannot after an unsuccessful war against the General Government be prohibited from exercising the rights of a State in the Union. And further, that as ours is a representative form of government, we are doing violence to our institutions by preventing any part of the people from being represented in the Government. These I believe are the main arguments relied upon by them for the correctness of their position. Let us examine them and see how far they have been true to these principles. In the first place, the argument that this is a Government of States, and that the Union was only a confederacy of States subject to be broken at the will of any State, was the one used by the secessionists for twenty-five years for the purpose of destroying the Union. They held that the State was sovereign, that the Union was only a temporary convenience, and that the State might dissolve it at pleasure, and is it not singular that now, having tried secession and failed, they endeavored to avail themselves of the very opposite doctrine? I hold that this doctrine is incorrect in principle and utterly pernicious and destructive of the very ends of government if carried out. It is not true that this is simply a Government of States. That was the basis upon which the old Union was formed and held together under the Articles of Confederation, but the system was found to be so defective that it was soon done away with. The States, acting upon the principle of their independence, disregarded the power of the General Government, and the latter was soon without power or authority among the States and without respect among other nations. The very weakness of the General Government was what occasioned the subsequent formation of the Federal Government under which we live. And, sir, while it is true that the Constitution of the United States is the fundamental chart by which we are to be governed, I contend that our fathers did more than to limit by express words what the Government could or could not do. When they created the Government of the United States they created a nation which from the very necessities of its creation and existence was entitled to powers and rights as such which are not defined in the Constitution. Among these is the right to do all things necessary for its preservation as such.

Had we not acted upon this principle we would have been destroyed at the very outset of the war, for we were then told that there was no power and authority under the Constitution to coerce a State. Is it not singular that this doctrine of the power of the States and the want of power in the Constitution to coerce them was used both to destroy and to create? By this sophistry they would have permitted the States to destroy the Union without molestation, because they told us there was no power in the Constitution to coerce them, and then when the States have been vanquished after a severe struggle, we are told that they still maintain their status under the Constitution, and charge us with being disunionists because we do not at once admit them. To show not only the utter absurdity but absolute danger there is in this wicked doctrine of State rights, it is necessary to inquire what constitutes a State and wherein is the power for evil. A State is composed of three things: first, a given area of territory; second, a certain number of people; and third, local municipal law. It is manifest that the territory can do no harm, except in so far as it may serve by natural defenses to aid the people in their work of rebellion. The local municipal law is the creature of the people, and can only be made an instrument of danger to the Government provided the people so will it. It follows, then, that of these three necessary elements that form a State, the only danger to be apprehended by the Government is from the people that constitute the State.

But we are told that no matter what the mind and heart of the people may be, no matter how hostile they are, and how ready they may be to destroy the General Government, and how much they may have done to destroy it, through the instrumentality of these lifeless corporations called the States, they are entitled to hold all the rights and privileges of the peaceable and loyal citizens of the Government. The whole people of a State may rebel, the people of ten States may rebel, and you have no power under the Constitution of the United States to coerce them because these indestructible things called the States dare not be interfered with. The people of those States after a long and desolating war may be overcome, and they are immediately invested with all the rights of American citizens by the aid of these immutable corporations called the States. Sir, that is the doctrine of national ruin, of national death. The people indignantly repudiated that doctrine at the beginning of the war; they repudiated it all through the war; and since the war is over they have repudiated it by one of the most sublime national verdicts ever recorded. And although a plan for the restoration of those States was agreed upon in the last session of this Congress by the representatives of the people, and was, together with the policy of the President, submitted to the people for their action in the late campaign, I look upon the decision of the people rather as a condemnation of the President's policy than an expression of opinion in favor of the plan proposed by Congress as the only way to settle our national difficulties.

We have, therefore, this all-important question before us, and are charged with the responsibility of deciding it, enlightened and guided, as we must be, by the overwhelming voice of those who sent us here. The policy of the President having been completely repudiated by the people we are compelled to look for some other mode of settlement that will be consistent with the wishes of the great body of the American people, and in harmony with those great principles of equal and exact justice that lie at the foundation of our Government. And I do not propose, sir, to embarrass myself with the consideration of the nice and subtle distinctions that are now being made in regard to whether those communities are still States, or whether, having taken up the sword and appealed to arms and been vanquished, they are reduced to the condition of Territories. For whether they are States or Territories, I maintain that the jurisdiction of the loyal States is full, ample, and complete over the question of their admission into the Union. If the doctrine as laid down by Vattel be correct, that—“A civil war breaks the bands of society and government, or at least suspends their force and effect; it produces in the nation two independent parties, who consider each other as enemies and acknowledge no common judge. Those two parties, therefore, must necessarily be considered as thenceforward constituting, at least for a time, two separate bodies, two distinct societies. Though one of these parties may have been to blame, in breaking the unity of the State and resisting the lawful authority, they are not the less divided in fact. Besides, who shall judge them? Who shall pronounce on which side the right or wrong lies? On earth they have no common superior. They stand, therefore, precisely in the same predicament as two nations who engage in a contest, and, being unable to come to an agreement, have recourse to arms.”—Vattel's Law of Nations, p. 425.

Then there can be no doubt as to our power over the question. On the other hand, if that rule does not apply, then I hold that the people of these States, having overthrown their institutions and placed them in an attitude of hostility to the Government, we as the conquering party have the right under that clause of the Constitution which requires that each State shall be guaranteed a republican form of government, to examine their forms of government and determine whether they are in conformity to the Constitution. If we do not possess this right, then all we did during the war was wrong, and the rebel States would have had the right to be represented in Congress during the war, embarrassing us by their votes in council as well as their guns in the field. But President Johnson (if indeed a person who has so completely swung around the circle of opinion that he may be quoted upon either side is entitled to be quoted at all as authority) has distinctly recognized this right when he demanded from them compliance with certain conditions, before even he would recognize their right to admission, and provided they sent loyal representatives. I may inquire here by what authority he imposes the last condition? If they are entitled as States to representation what power has he to limit their selection to loyal representatives? Does not the fact that he does so limit them upset his whole doctrine of restoration? Whether as States or Territories, then, as we have the power to direct upon what terms they shall be admitted, it remains to be determined what is the safe way out of the difficulties that now surround us.

In view of the great struggle that the nation has passed through two things seem to be necessary: first, to enact such legislation as will best provide against like difficulties in the future; and second, to protect in every possible way the people in the South who have been true to the Union, without regard to their race or color. Had the people in those States signified their willingness to accept the amendments to the Constitution by this Congress, we would have been bound in good faith to accept them, but having rejected them it now becomes our duty to enact such further legislation as will thoroughly protect all classes of people. The amendments are necessary as part of the work of reconstruction, declaring as they do who are citizens of the United States, providing against an undue exercise of political power on the part of any State by prohibiting it from including in the basis of representation any class of people who may be denied the right of suffrage, excluding certain rebels from the right to hold office, and declaring the national debt binding upon the nation, while forever prohibiting the payment of any portion of the debt contracted by the rebels. These provisions are all wise and necessary; and as they have been so fully discussed and sanctioned by the great body of the American people I will not dwell upon them here. But in addition to them one thing more is needed, and that is, to confer the elective franchise upon all loyal men in those States as provided in the fourth section of the bill.

I believe that this should be done both as a matter of right and expediency. In declaring it to be a matter of right I am aware that I come in conflict with that class of people who believe that this Government was erected exclusively for the benefit of the white man. Sir, there never was a more unsound, pernicious doctrine proclaimed than that this is a white man's Government. When the fathers of the Revolution proclaimed the great principles enumerated in the Declaration of Independence, that all men were created free, that they were entitled to certain inalienable rights, among which were life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and that "Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed," they spoke the voice of humanity, asserting its rights in bold and manly terms after centuries of cruelty, oppression and misgovernment. Their platform was no narrow, circumscribed one, but broad enough to cover all creeds, all classes and conditions of men, and whether thoroughly understood by them and acted up to by them or not, or whether understood and acted up to by us in this generation or not, it will ever continue to inspire fresh hope in the heart of mankind, and will serve as the shibboleth of the party of progress in its conflicts with error, until every wrong done to humanity shall be effaced, and the whole family of man be governed by the same broad and generous principles of justice, equality, and fraternity.

But if we are to be governed in our opinions by the action of our fathers, then we should extend the ballot to the freedmen; for I believe it to be a fact that after the formation of the Government, in every State except one the ballot was given to all free men of color, thus showing that they recognized the right of the colored man to the elective franchise. I hold, however, that in a Government where the people rule, every man who has a stake in the Government should have the ballot for his own protection. His property is liable to taxation for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the Government, his personal services are demanded by the Government in time of war; he is affected by the public legislation of the country in his person and property, then why should he be prohibited from having a voice in the selection of his rulers? The great cry now raised by the advocates for the immediate admission of the rebel representatives is, that we are imposing taxation upon them without representation, but they are not willing to apply this principle to the four million blacks who will now have to bear their share of the burden of the Government. On the contrary, they would have representation without taxation, for they seem exceedingly anxious to represent these same four million blacks whose taxes they do not pay. I claim it further as a right to the black man because he has been true to the Government in her late struggle with treason, while his master, with all the advantages of education, intellectual culture, the right of the ballot, and unlimited political power in a country that had known him only to bestow benefactions upon him, proved a traitor, the poor, untutored, illiterate slave, proved true to the country in which he apparently had little to expect, its highest judicial tribunal having declared that he had no rights in the Government which a white man was bound to respect.

But the black man is entitled to the ballot as a matter of protection against the very men who for four years have been in arms to destroy the Government. While you may disfranchise leading traitors, the great body of them will still be permitted to exercise the elective franchise, and as time rolls on and the passions and feelings of this generation are tempered by lapse of time they, too, may be restored to that right. We have seen enough to satisfy even the most skeptical that there exists in the minds of the rebels a deep-seated hatred against the colored race because they would not identify themselves with the cause of their masters. They have shown it in the legislation enacted since the overthrow of the rebellion, by which they have introduced slavery in everything except the name. Sir, it is a solemn, imperative duty that this nation owes to its colored people to protect them against their and the country's foes. It would be a burning, lasting disgrace to the nation were it to hand them over to their enemies. I know of no way in which this protection can be better given than by extending to them the elective franchise. Civil rights bills, Freedmen's Bureau bills, and all kindred measures will fail so long as they can be evaded by local legislation; but place the ballot in the hands of the black man and you give him that which insures him respect as well as protection. You send him forth armed with the panoply of the American citizen, wielding that most powerful of all weapons, the ballot—

"Which falls
Like snow-flakes fall upon the sod,
Yet executes a freeman's will,
As lightning does the will of God."

Sir, thus much for the right involved in the question of extending the ballot to freedmen. A few suggestions as to the expediency of it and I am done. I may suggest that in that vast population so lately in armed hostility to the Union it could scarcely be expected that in heart and mind they could for many years to come be friendly to the Government which they have just tried to destroy. As a counterpoise to this hostile element introduced into the Government, will be the infusion into it of the steady patriotism and blind faith of the black population, balancing so much loyalty against so much disloyalty. The bestowal of the elective franchise to the freedman would have a tendency to elevate him and raise him above the condition that his recent release from slavery has left him in. And should we not rather strive to elevate than depress so large a number of people, constituting, as they do, nearly one seventh of the entire population of the country? Will not the nation be more benefited by the moral, religious, and political improvement of this large class of people than by permitting them to remain in a state of ignorance and helplessness? And what can be better calculated to infuse hope into the mind, elevate the understanding, and enlighten the conscience of the freedman, than to invest him with all the rights, duties, and responsibilities of an American citizen? I am not willing to believe, sir, that the elevation of this poor, unfortunate race of people will tend to degrade the white race, but am rather inclined to think that as they rise in the scale of intelligence so will the white race advance to a greater degree of improvement.

But it is expedient in another point of view, and that is as a final and complete settlement of the negro question. Since the formation of the Government the condition of the negro has been the vexed question in our politics. The war worked his release from bondage, and with it came the question of his right to citizenship and the ballot. It has been truly said that unsettled questions leave no repose, and especially is this the case in a Government where all questions must stand the test of public discussion. And with the negro asserting his rights, with the mighty intellectual power in the North arrayed upon his side, and with public sentiment fast drifting in that direction, its settlement cannot long be deferred. Sir, confer this right, and not only does the agitation of the question cease, but you approximate nearer to the great fundamental principles upon which our Government rests; the great disturbing element is removed from our body-politic, and our institutions will be in harmony with the ideas and principles upon which they were founded. I have no fears in extending this privilege to the black man. I would infinitely rather trust the ballot to the black man who shouldered a musket to defend his Government than to the white traitor who tried to destroy it. The enfranchisement of black loyalists and disfranchisement of certain rebels, or rather suffrage upon a loyal basis, will be the surest protection to the loyal whites of the South. Unless they are reinforced by the addition of the loyal black element it is perfectly manifest that they will be subjected to rebel rule. In fact, that whole section is almost as completely dominated over by rebel authority as when Lee's battalions held undisputed sway over it. There to have been loyal to the Government is to be subjected to the scorn and hatred of the rebels, and in many sections life itself is endangered by reason of their intense hatred against Unionists.

The voice of the loyal whites of the South, who have suffered every conceivable wrong on account of their fidelity to the Union, comes to us demanding in thunder tones that we shall so reconstruct this Government that its friends, and not its enemies, shall rule. We would be untrue to them, untrue to the martyred dead, untrue to ourselves and to posterity, if we disregard their admonitions. Sir, the great duty rests upon us to finish the work which was not completed by warfare. The shackles of four million slaves were melted by the fierce fires of civil war; but the animus of slavery, its passions and prejudices, yet remain. It is our duty so to legislate as to remove the last relic of a barbarism that would have suited the dark ages, and to conform our institutions to the advanced condition to which we have been brought by the mighty revolution just ended. And when this shall have been done the great Republic, freed from the dark stain of human slavery, will start upon her mission to promulgate, by precept and example, the immutable and eternal truth of the equality of man, and before whose resistless march kingdoms and empires, principalities and powers, and all the systems built upon caste and creed for the oppression of man, will be swept from the face of the earth, and be known no more forever.

Mr. SCOTFIELD. Mr. Speaker, as the confederate population, five or six million in numbers, is to remain in this country and to some extent shape its destiny, it is all-important that we so reconstruct the Union that this population may become an element of strength rather than of weakness to the Republic. Powerful as we are we can hardly afford to allow a population so large, brave, and reckless to settle down into chronic discontent—forever to be to America what Ireland is to Great Britain, Poland to Russia, or Hungary to Austria—an ever-ready element of revolution. To avoid this result is the avowed purpose of both political parties; but strange to say, with the same professed end in view, they start out upon paths leading in quite opposite directions. The Republicans claim that the Union can be best preserved by removing the causes of discontent and thus extinguishing the motives to disunion, while the Democrats think the Union can be best preserved by tolerating, conciliating, and fostering the errors and wrongs from which disunion sprang.

For instance, the preservation of slavery was the original motive for secession. To destroy this motive the Republicans propose to abolish and the Democrats to foster slavery. Acting upon their theory, and anticipating the final overthrow of the rebellion, the Republicans began early in the war the removal of its cause. They prohibited the extension of slavery, abolished it in the District of Columbia, forbade the return of slaves by the Army, repealed the fugitive slave law, supported Fremont's, Hunter's, and Phelps' partial and Mr. Lincoln's more general proclamation of freedom, and finally by an amendment of the Constitution prohibited it everywhere and forever. Thus it was hoped that when the rebellion should be suppressed no conflicting interest would be left, about which the North and South could quarrel. There appeared, however, to be a lingering hope in the minds of the late masters that in a separate republic the institution might still be revived in some modified form and something at least of their large investment saved, and to this extent the motive to renew the struggle in more propitious times survived. This hope and motive for disunion would grow weaker and weaker as the subject-race become more and more intelligent, thrifty, and self-reliant.

To facilitate this result the civil rights and Freedmen's Bureau, the franchise, and many other minor bills of like import were passed by Congress. The advancement of the negro was thought to be a greater hindrance to the revival of the disunion institution and a greater discouragement of confederate outbreaks than repealable laws or amendable constitutions. This was the Republican plan of reunion. The Democrats, acting on their theory of fostering and thus conciliating the disturbing elements, opposed all measures for emancipation, and are still opposing bills for the improving the colored race. I do not question their sincerity. Quite likely they sincerely thought that the best way to unite the North and South was to yield to, extend, cherish, and propitiate the cause of disagreement. But this is passed. The great work is nearly accomplished, and I refer to the course of the two parties upon it only to illustrate my position, that they seek the preservation of the Union in diametrically opposite directions.

The Republicans had hoped that by the removal of this original cause of quarrel all incentives to disunion would disappear; but on the threshold of reconstruction another and to some extent an unexpected trouble presents itself. The confederacy had four and a quarter years of nationality. During this time vast interests, passions, and resentments grew up under and centered in it. She contracted many debts, a debt in bonds and currency to her capitalists, of damages to her property-holders, of honor to her soldiers, memory to her fallen, and alms to the suffering. The dead claim homage; the maimed, widowed and orphans, pensions; the impoverished, payment; and the leaders, historic honors. These interests and passions embrace all classes and appeal to all hearts within the circumference of confederate power. This makes a cause stronger than slavery. There is more money in it by half, and quite as much to awaken resentment or provoke resistance.

If these people come back with these interests unbarred by a constitutional amendment, how can they avoid struggling to save in the Union all that was risked in the confederacy? If they do not, they must be worse than men or better than angels. But these interests are in direct conflict with the corresponding interests of the Federal Government. The reunited nation cannot honor Grant for preserving the Union and Lee for attempting to destroy it. We cannot mourn for the three hundred thousand Union dead and pension the men at whose hands they fell. It will be another war of sectional interests to be fought over in the Halls of Congress, the State Legislatures, on the hustings, and then again if opportunity presents on the field of blood. The "lost cause will take the place of the slave power" with a larger investment to back it, and a less repulsive face to defend.

What shall be done with this new element of disintegration and strife? The Republicans propose to dispose of it as they did slavery—bury it by another amendment of the Constitution. And why shall not this be done, and the Union thus purified and harmonized restored at once? Does Congress stand in the way? No, sir; for eight months the two policies—Republican surgery and Democratic opiates—were discussed and contrasted in these Halls, and almost everybody here came to the conclusion that it was better to cure than palliate the disorder. The amendment was agreed to four to one. Do the people neglect their duty? No, sir; the amendment was sent out to them and for three or four months rediscussed. They approved it, and in twenty-three of the twenty-six States elected Legislatures instructed to adopt it. Do these legislative servants disobey instructions? No, sir; they are now assembling, and State after State is recording its verdict. Very soon these twenty-three States, having a population in 1860 of twenty-one million five hundred thousand, and not less than twenty-seven millions now, will send to a perfidious Secretary the official evidence of the people's will. Delaware, three counties large, Maryland, betrayed to the confederates by a servant less treacherous than weak, and Kentucky, whose patriotism in the great struggle hardly rose above a dissembling neutrality, alone give a negative answer.

By the census of 1860 the entire population of these three States, white and black, was only 1,955,000, and cannot much exceed those figures now. Who then stands in the way? Not the Democratic party; the amendment was beyond their reach when it passed Congress and was indorsed by the people: not the President; the Constitution withholds from him any authority over the question of amendment. Who, then, stands in the way? One old man who is charged by law with the duty of proclaiming the adoption of the amendment, but who (the Chicago defeat being still unavenged) has determined to incorporate into the Union the debris of the late confederacy; to be in place of the "irrepressible conflict" the breeder of present broils and future rebellions—he stands in the way. He has contrived a theory of estoppel. The amendment, he tells us, is void without confederate sanction. The will of the people of twenty-three States, nay, the whole twenty-six if they had been unanimous, must go for nothing unless approved by a few million rebels scattered through the confederate States. Having set up his theory, he undertakes to procure from these "misguided people"—never more misguided than when led by him—an expression of dissent. His machinations are likely to be successful.

In 1861 the southern heart was fired by the taunts and promises of northern Democrats. "The election of Lincoln," they would say, "is an assault upon your institutions and an insult to the South." They promised in case of trouble to take care of the abolitionists. There should be no coercion; but when the trouble came they shrunk away from the people they had thus prompted, perhaps unintentionally, to resist. A good deal of half-treasonable criticism on the action of the Government when deeply embarrassed and struggling for life, a little secret encouragement and silent sympathy for the foe, were the only noticeable departures from a strict neutrality. Their promise was broken. Let me warn these confederates who have abandoned their scheme of separation in good faith to beware of their old advisers and their new leader.

Here, then, arises an intermediate question. It is not whether confederate assets shall be buried in the same grave with slavery as the Republicans propose, nor whether they shall be tenderly taken up and warmed into venomous life in the bosom of the Union as the Democrats propose; but whether this question shall be determined by the States in the Union or by the confederate States.

What then is the status of the ten confederate States? Are they States or Territories in the Union? If States, they can control the other twenty-six on a question of amendment; if not, not. They must be one or the other. Some suppose they strike intermediate ground by calling them overthrown, disorganized, or suspended States. But certainly a State overthrown or suspended is not at present an existing State, nor is a disorganized an organized State. If they have no present existence as States they are only at the most theoretic States, which are no States; or prospective States, which are Territories. They have certainly not been acting as States during the last six years, and they are only claimed to be so because no way for the severance of a State from the Union is provided in the Constitution. Once a State therefore always a State. If they are States now they have been so for the last six years. Look at the consequences. By article one, section five of the Constitution, no business can be done in the absence of a quorum, and a quorum is there declared to be a majority of all the members. Now, if the confederate States were also States in the Union for the last six years this House consisted of two hundred and forty-two members, and no business could be constitutionally done without the presence of one hundred and twenty-two members. But for all this time we have acted on the hypothesis that the House was composed of only one hundred and eighty-four members, deducting fifty-eight for the rebel States and that ninety-three made a quorum. The Senate has acted on a similar presumption, counting twenty-six instead of thirty-seven as the constitutional quorum. Probably more than half of our legislation has been enacted, as will appear of record, when either the House had less than one hundred and twenty-two, or the Senate less than thirty-seven members present. All this must therefore be unconstitutional and void.

Again, a presidential election occurred during the war. If the confederate States had not forfeited their privileges as States in the Union they were entitled to cast eighty electoral votes. These eighty votes might have decided the contest, and they might thus have chosen the Commander-in-Chief of our Army and Navy to conduct the war against them; or by casting their votes for Jefferson Davis they might have defeated an election by the people and thrown it into this House. What then? We vote by States, (article two, section seven,) and two thirds of all the States must be represented. If Kentucky and Missouri had joined the confederacy as they attempted to do—and they actually were represented in it during the entire war—more than one third of the States would have been absent, and the election of President would have become impossible. The Senate would have encountered the same difficulty in the election of Vice President. To perform this duty two thirds of all the Senators must be present. That number could not be had in the case supposed, and so we must go without executive officers until the rebel States choose to relieve us by sending representatives to aid in choosing them for us.

Suppose, again, that pending the war it had become absolutely necessary to amend the Constitution, that all parties concurred in its propriety, and the loyal States were unanimous upon the subject, it could not have been done without the consent of the confederate States. Though formed into a separate republic and conducting a war with this, not the slightest change in our fundamental law, however necessary to our salvation, could be had without their consent. And this state of things would have continued as long as the war continued, even if it were a quarter of a century; worse than that, sir, in the light of this theory they were States in the Union until released or expelled by an amendment of the Constitution. Such an amendment required the consent of all the States. No matter, then, how the war should terminate or whether it terminated at all, their power over us could never be severed without their consent. Seceding and fighting would not do, you say, because these were unconstitutional acts. But whipping us, I would suppose, would be quite as unconstitutional as fighting. If they had succeeded in the war and maintained a separate republic they could then have run their own government and in part controlled ours in spite of us. The absurdity of this hypothesis proves the truth of the other. When a State rebels and levies war against the Union, it thereby forfeits its privileges as a State, and can only be restored by Congress.

Absurd as the other theory is, upon it the Secretary of State has undertaken to bring back to the Union the confederate population, freighted with all the belligerent interest collected by four and a quarter years of nationality and war. How? Not by convincing the people; that has been tried and failed. Not by executive patronage, that has failed also. Not by corrupting Congress, for his old lobbyist is powerless here. No, sir; he meditates the seduction of another old man who happens to hold the balance of power in the Supreme Court; vague rumors of a mission to England are afloat. The Secretary seems to think that a man who can betray his constituents and misrepresent his State will make a good misrepresentative of the nation abroad; and why not send a second champion of his theory to flaunt his spoiled ermine at the court of St. James and negotiate treaties for the payment of confederate cotton bonds or a release of claims for the piracies of the Alabama?

But his judge must have something to stand upon. The courts follow precedents and the Rhode Island case stands in the way. This question is there held to be a political one, to be decided by the political department of the Government. Eventually he will insist that this decision has been made and made in his favor. To meet this emergency he is now and has been for some time preparing his facts. The emancipation amendment was agreed to by twenty-three States out of the twenty-five then in the Union—many more than the number required for its adoption; but in his proclamation he chose to omit from his count a portion of these States and add seven confederate communities to make the number required by his construction. There is a precedent for his judge. So he submitted without authority to these same communities the amendment now under consideration to be acted on by them in the capacity of States. There is another precedent. The Interior is prompted to issue agricultural land scrip which can only be given to States in the Union, and the Treasury and Post-Office Departments are ordered out of their line of duties to make some small recognition of these communities as States. These will make so many more precedents for his judge.

The Secretary first declares they are States, treats them as States, procures other Executive Departments to do likewise, and then cites his acts and declarations to enable a willing judge to decide that they are States, and thus launch into the heart of the Republic a confederate shell with fuse still burning by a single twitch of his gown.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Speaker, I simply wish to ask the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, whether this House did not adopt a resolution making it the duty of Mr. McPHERSON, its Clerk, to forward the very constitutional amendment about which he is arguing to the different States lately in rebellion before he knew the Secretary of State had forwarded it?

Mr. SCOFIELD. I do not recollect any such action of the House. But if sent to them by us it was only to allow them an opportunity to prove their loyalty by giving it their assent. In the preamble to the bill readmitting Tennessee their assent to this amendment is recited, among other things, as evidence of the loyalty of the government de facto, and as a reason for legitimatizing it and admitting it into the Union. For this purpose we of course desired them to have a copy, but, unlike the Secretary of State, we did not expect that the assent of these communities would fasten this amendment upon the country without the concurrence of three fourths of the adhering States, nor that their dissent would defeat it if that concurrence was had.

The Secretary is clever in work of this kind. An English nobleman was at one time exhibiting his kennel to an American friend, and passing by many of his showiest bloods they came upon one that seemed nearly used up. "This," said the nobleman, "is the most valuable animal in the pack although he is old, lame, blind, and deaf." "How is that?" inquired the visitor. The nobleman explained: "His education was good, to begin with, and his wonderful sense of smell is still unimpaired. We only take him out to catch the scent and put the puppies on the track and then return him to the kennel." Do not suppose that I intend any comparison between the Secretary of State and that veteran hunter. Such a comparison would be neither dignified nor truthful, because the Englishman went on to say: "I have owned that dog for thirteen years, and hard as he looks he never bit the hand that fed him, nor barked on a false trail." [Laughter and applause on the floor and in the galleries, promptly checked by the Speaker.]

I would inquire of the Chair if my time has expired.

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. STEVENS, (in his seat.) The Chair called you to order for doing injustice to the dog. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. SCOFIELD. I mistook the fall of the hammer for a notice to quit. However, I have but little more to add. The charge is often made here and elsewhere that the Republican policy of reconstruction leads to disintegration rather than reunion. In reply to that charge I am endeavoring to show that its tendency is to harmonize and cement the Union. I follow this narrow line of argument because it has fallen to others to discuss that policy in connection with the abstract principles of republican government, justice, religion, humanity, and civilization already.

When interrupted I was going on to say that the Secretary, in his efforts to baffle the Union policy of the Republican party, will even claim that his guerrilla governments have the implied sanction of Congress. For more than a year these organizations have usurped the control of public affairs in their several localities and systematically oppressed and persecuted the Union people there. For more than a year we have been inactive, if not silent witnesses of these usurpations. We have taken no steps to suppress them nor to provide the people with constitutional governments. The existing ones are only the confederate governments revived—more oppressive, malignant, and resentful, under the feeble restraints of a cowed opponent, than under the iron rule of the confederate president himself. The despotism and barbarities of Davis were not wanton. They had a purpose—the success of the confederate cause. The "stern statesman" allowed no further license; but under the Seward dynasty lynching and murder has become a pastime. Better by far for the Union men of the South if their governments were again placed under the restraining despotism of Jefferson Davis. At least he would not allow helpless and unoffending people to be mobbed and murdered for no confederate or public purpose.

How much longer shall we turn a deaf ear to the cry of the oppressed? How much longer shall we stand here and see the brave men who for four years, amid obloquy, persecution, imprisonment, and torture, refused to forswear the flag, now when that flag is triumphant, in part through their sufferings, driven from their homes or shot down in the streets like dogs? If we thus meanly desert our friends the rebels themselves will despise us. But how about the Secretary, his cunning, his precedents, and his judges? They are not to be feared. They may protract our national trouble and delay the restoration of the Union a little longer; but that is all. The people have concluded that the best way to harmonize and cement the Union is to bury whatever is left of slavery and confederate nationality in a common grave; and it will be done. The Nile may be dammed with bulrushes, but the just, benignant, and well-considered purpose of a forty-million nation cannot be turned aside by the tinkle of one old man's bell nor the rustle of another's gown. For one I am ready for the vote.

Mr. WARD addressed the House. [His remarks will be found in the Appendix.] At the conclusion of his remarks he said: I yield, as I have promised, the remaining portion of my time to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. LE BLOND. Mr. Speaker, I have changed my purpose, and now conclude not to make any remarks on this subject, but will defer what I have to say till the bill in reference to the Electoral Colleges, introduced by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, is taken up.

Mr. PLANTS. Mr. Speaker, I have not trespassed upon the time of the House with much speaking since I have had the honor of a seat here; but in view of the transcendent importance of the questions now under consideration I propose to state briefly some of the reasons for the votes I am about to give.

When, at the last session, Congress adopted and sent to the States for their ratification the proposed amendment to the Constitution of the United States, I understood it to be done in good faith, as a basis of reconstruction; and that when ratified in like good faith by the disorganized States, Representatives from such States having the qualifications required by said amendment should be admitted. Upon that understanding I voted for the amendment, and also for the admission of Tennessee, she having complied with the terms. That, sir, was my understanding at the time. That it was likewise the understanding of my State is proved by the fact that the Union convention of Ohio adopted that amendment as the sole platform of the party upon that subject. Upon that platform, so adopted and indorsed, I accepted a renomination to the Fortieth Congress, and in a very full canvass before the people of my district it was made the text of every speech during the campaign. Upon that issue, fairly and distinctly made, the people rendered their verdict. I do not assume to speak for others, but I do know that the people of my district, and I believe of my State, did emphatically indorse that amendment as the basis of reconstruction, conditioned, of course, upon its acceptance by the unrepresented States and the conforming of their constitutions and laws to its provisions. And, sir, I stand by that platform to-day, and so far as I am advised I believe the people of my district and State are yet willing to abide by that understanding.

Mr. Speaker, that amendment may not, in all respects, be all that the people would have desired, or the best plan that could have been devised. But satisfied that it was the very best thing practicable, as being the only scheme upon which all the Union members could be brought to unite, and good in itself as far as it went, I accepted and supported it in good faith, both here and before the people. But I everywhere stated that if the people of the rebel States should madly refuse to accept the terms thus offered—terms of unparalleled magnanimity—that then I would feel myself released from all express or implied obligation created thereby, and free to adopt such other measures as the exigencies of the country might demand.

Mr. Speaker, the action of the controlling element of those States has made it manifest that they have not only refused to accept the more than generous terms proposed, but have rejected them with contumely, and with the haughty and insulting bravado of assumed superiority demand that the nation shall submit to such terms as they shall dictate. I am prepared, therefore, to take the step in advance. But in doing so I do not repudiate the amendment or intend to supersede it by the action about to be taken. For while by the action of the rebels themselves it has ceased to be practicable, as the basis of settlement, it is still of vital importance to our future security as conforming our Constitution to the changed circumstances of the country resulting from the rebellion. I therefore hope and trust that that amendment will yet be ratified by the States having a right to act upon it, and thus become a part of our fundamental law, not now as the only basis of reconstruction, but as right and important when reconstruction shall have been consummated. And I am now ready for further action.

But, sir, while I sympathize fully with the purpose sought to be accomplished by the authors of the bill and the substitute now under consideration, I am free to say that I am not fully satisfied with either. I shall, therefore, vote to refer them both, with the proposed amendments, to the joint Committee on Reconstruction, with the hope that something approaching nearer to my views may be devised. But in saying this I do not wish to be understood as indicating a purpose to vote against either of the bills as they are if the judgment of the House should differ from mine in this respect. I have learned in my short experience here that in practical legislation it is the part of wisdom to accept the attainable good, although imperfect, rather than to strive in vain for the supposed perfection which is unattainable. I shall therefore vote for the proposition in that shape in which it shall be finally presented for our votes, unless encumbered with features such as I have no right to suppose will be given to it by the committee or the House. I take this stand because I believe that the end proposed will be in a good degree reached by embodying the main propositions of either bill into a law. That end, as I suppose, is to give the country repose from the terrors of the anarchy which now reigns in one section of it and the apprehension of financial ruin which paralyzes the energies of the other. Believing that the enactment of such a measure into a law, and its due enforcement, will give such repose, I shall give it my vote.

Sir, if history teaches any lesson with an unbroken series of examples, it is that material prosperity and social progress are only possible where life and person, and property are secured by laws approaching at least toward justice; and administered with some degree of impartiality. It might, perhaps, be possible to have all these in large measure, if men would be so contented, without political liberty. But unfortunately for the advocates of class legislation the aspirations of all men are toward freedom; and wherever this is not enjoyed the relations between the rulers and the ruled become those of irreconcilable antagonism. And hence, ever-brewing revolutions are suppressed by the bloody instrumentalities of despotism, or despots are unseated by successful revolution. And, alas! too often anarchy lies between, making even despotism itself a relief from the greater horrors of contending and unrestrained factions. And the no longer concealed thought that here and there finds expression indicates that there are those in the country now who dream of a monarchy as an escape from the rule of the people, which they esteem as the reign of the mob. But that thought is insanity. Whatever else may come, it will not be a king securely enthroned upon the ruins of this Republic.

But, sir, the country must have repose; it will have freedom; not the quiet of despotism, not the license of the mob, but that peace which comes from the full enjoyment of rational liberty secured by the enforcement of impartial law. This the people in their majesty have decreed, and that decree will be executed; and if accidental Presidents and fossilized judges and whipped insurgents and pardoned and unpardoned rebels and their sympathizers throw themselves in the way, why, then, Mr. Speaker—the decree will be executed nevertheless; for the will of the people in this country is and will continue to be, in political matters, omnipotent! Those who attempt to thwart that will may be as brave as the bull that fought the locomotive, but they partake of his discretion likewise.

Sir, every interest, every section, and every class of our people demand at our hands the settlement of this question. Four million freedmen, black although they be and degraded by oppression, send up their mute appeal to us for protection—an appeal which we may not disregard. With a sublime trust in God and the pledged faith of the nation in its day of mortal peril they gave themselves to our cause in every way in which they could aid us; and with a patience and endurance without a parallel they have suffered and waited, and still suffer and wait for the fulfillment of that promise and the fruition of their hopes. By every sentiment of honor, by every dictate of duty, by every motive of self-interest, we are bound to give them security in their lives, their persons, and the fruits of their labors. It needs no citation of evidence to show that no such protection is now accorded to them. Left in the power of those who formerly enslaved them no one at all acquainted with human nature had any right to look for results differing from those that come to us in every day's report of wrong and outrage.

For generations the slaveholders, in absolute disregard of every idea of right, lived in luxurious idleness upon the unpaid toil of these people. Not only revelling in the wealth produced by the labor of the slaves, many used them for vile purposes; and to gratify their avarice or their ostentation, sent their own dusky children to the auction-block and the shambles. This state of things bred up another class there such as can only exist in a slave-cursed land—a class too poor to own slaves, too lazy to work, and too ignorant to comprehend their own utter degradation. Without one redeeming quality they were more servile to the master class than the slaves themselves, having no other idea of liberty than to "kick a nigger" with impunity, or of patriotism than to curse the Union. Between these two classes there were hundreds, and I have no doubt thousands, who, in the midst of the surrounding pollutions, kept themselves free from the prevailing vices of their section, and in whose hearts burned unquenchably the fires of a true patriotism and the sentiments of honor and right. But they were either in the minority or were overawed by the other classes, which, like the upper and the nether millstones, ground them as well as the negroes to powder.

To perpetuate their rule these slaveholders and their stupid dupes struck with traitor's arms at the nation's life! I need not recite the history of the rebellion. More than three hundred thousand graves, sanctified by the remains of martyred heroes, make up one chapter! Fifty thousand empty sleeves and bootless limbs another! The land filled with widows and orphaned children, and homes draped in mourning, still another! And a mountain of debt and burdensome taxation continues the story! But, sir, while the record is mainly written in blood and can only be read with melancholy reflections, there is, thank God! one bright chapter—that which chronicles the eternal overthrow of the whole infernal system! And shall we blot out that only fair chapter by permitting these same conquered traitors to seize again these millions of freedmen and hurl them back to the condition of slaves? How shall we answer at the bar of God and the righteous opinion of the civilized world if we suffer this great wrong? No, our duty to this wronged and patient people demands at our hands the passage of some measure of reconstruction.

And, sir, the Union men of the South—and I have said there are thousands of them there—demand this action at our hands. Nobler and truer men never lived than are the Union men of the South; and living men never suffered and endured as many of them did for their fidelity to their country. They were fully entitled to the protection of the Government they loved and to the extent of their ability upheld. But the Government during all the bloody years of the rebellion was unable to give them that protection. The war has closed; the Government lives, and these noble men, ruined in fortune, are still its friends, but hated, despised, and persecuted by the conquered traitors. Will that Government, dare it, now in the day of its triumph and its power, with ingratitude unexampled, with folly inconceivable, refuse them that protection, and turn them over, fettered and unarmed to the merciless vengeance of their unrelenting enemies? Sir, for one I will never consent to so inexcusable a wrong. For the protection of the Union men of the South, therefore, I will sustain in some form this measure.

Again, sir, the true interests of the rebels themselves, although in their madness they will not see it, require the settlement of this great question. So long as they retain the slightest hope of defeating the will of the people and again reveling in the spoils of their victims it will be impossible to restore security and prosperity to the South. Having heretofore lived in idleness upon the labor of the negroes, they will not resort to any honest means of procuring a livelihood until their last hope of further plundering them is blotted out forever. The only source of national or even individual wealth and prosperity is the products in some form of human labor. But the rebels will not labor so long as there is any hope of making the negroes work for them. And the negro is, at least, so far "a man and a brother,"—that he is not over-zealous to work for nothing. The result is even now a poverty approaching to absolute starvation for both. And this state of things will not only continue but must grow worse if the relations between these classes are not definitely settled. But let it be settled once for all that these rebels shall not defy all law and outrage every sentiment of justice with impunity and they will be compelled either to resort to some more honest calling where they are or remove to some other section where they will be absorbed into a better population. As the true friend of the rebels themselves, therefore, I shall vote for this measure. In short, sir, the interests of the whole people of the country require this settlement.

As I have just said, national wealth and prosperity depend upon labor. Agriculture, manufactures, and commerce—the production of the raw material, its conversion into fabrics, and their interchange—constitute the wealth of the world; and they all depend upon labor. Where labor is best respected, encouraged, protected, and aided by machinery, there will be the largest measure of national wealth, prosperity, and progress. But here we have a state of things that utterly paralyzes the energies and prostrates the labor of a population of twelve millions, and excludes the use of machinery that would make them equal, in the production of wealth, to one hundred millions. The consequence is, that outside of the disturbed districts every class of the people are affected injuriously in their business. But the people of the loyal States are not only injured in their business, but they are also seriously affected by the onerous burden of taxation imposed upon them in consequence. The credit of the nation must be sustained; the interest on the public debt must be paid; the expenses of the Government must be provided; and all this must be done by the levy and collection of taxes in some form; but these taxes at last are but a per cent. upon the products of the labor of the country. While, then, the condition of the South remains such that the labor of her people—one third of the whole population of the country—is unproductive, the whole burden of taxation is necessarily thrown upon the labor of the other two thirds. I have not time to exhibit the various forms in which the loyal States are interested in this settlement. Suffice it to say that we shall have failed most signally in the performance of our duty if we do not "exhaust the resources of statesmanship" in securing a speedy and permanent settlement. In the hope that it may be so reached I shall vote for this measure.

But, sir, if I am asked if I expect the rebels in the South to accept the provisions of this or whatever measure we may adopt and to become reconciled to the new era which it proposes to inaugurate, if, in short, they will cordially fraternize with loyal men, I very frankly answer that I do not. I never expect them to be any less the enemies of loyal men than they are now. Nor do I expect them ever to cease plotting against the Union and fraternizing with its enemies wherever found. I have not studied human nature so imperfectly as to hope for any such absurdities. If asked again if I expect a perpetual sectional antagonism between the North and the South, I answer unhesitatingly that I do not. I do expect the antagonism between the loyal and disloyal elements to continue, but not that between the sections. If the South was as densely populated as Ireland—if an overcrowded population was forcing emigrants out of the country, instead of its vast unoccupied territory inviting immigration to it—I say frankly I would have no hope of the future. It is, sir, because there is abundant room for a population of two hundred millions in the section which now contains but twelve, and nearly one half of them loyal, that I look not only with hope but with confidence to the future. Settle this question of reconstruction; take the murderous weapons from the hands and the local governments from the control of the rebels; make it safe to do so, and there will be such an immigration to the South as the world never saw. And it is on this immigration I build all my hopes.

Of the ten millions in the unrepresented States nearly four millions are negroes, and all loyal. Of the whites I think it is safe to assume that two millions are friendly to the Government, leaving but four millions of the disloyal element; and a considerable fraction of these, for the sake of peace and security, would quietly acquiesce and gradually come to a tacit if not cordial support of the Union and the Constitution. This would leave not more than three millions of a hostile, rebellious, and dangerous population. But of this number not more probably than four hundred thousand are males of mature age. Settle the question permanently, and not one will ever be added to their present number. On the contrary, with the extinction of all hope of ruling the nation or of disrupting it the number will rapidly diminish. The old will die, and the ambitious will leave the scene of their humiliation, and left without their leaders the great mass of the remainder will give no serious trouble. This is one side of the picture. Let us look a moment at the other side.

These States embrace the garden-spot of this continent, if not of the world. The sun shines upon no equal area so favored in every respect as this. It has a climate varied, salubrious, genial, and healthy beyond comparison with any other, and suited to all tastes and all conditions. It has a soil as varied, and prolific in all the agricultural products which give sustenance, luxury, and wealth to its cultivators. It has mineral resources of unimaginable richness waiting development. It has mountains pillared up with copper and iron and coal, while they are underflowed with salt and petroleum and covered with forests of valuable timber. It has broad valleys watered by beautiful rivers, and water-power which if properly employed might weave and forge for the world. It has thousands of miles of ocean and gulf coast indented with bays and harbors, the inevitable seats of an undreamed-of commerce. And this natural Eden invites to its bowers the immigrants from all lands.

In looking back to the settlement of our western Territories and their erection into States and incorporation into the Union, the imagination itself becomes staggered at the result. Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Missouri, Iowa, Wisconsin, Minnesota, Kansas, California, Oregon, Nevada, Nebraska, Colorado, and our free Territories, have all, within the memory of living men, been redeemed from the wilderness, clothed with cultivation, dotted over with cities, and checkered with railroads. The very air has become tremulous with the music of machinery, and every avenue is crowded with commerce. The busy millions of the ever-increasing population occupy homes of comfort and elegance, while churches, schools, academies, and colleges mark as mile-stones the very by-paths of the land. Whence, sir, this miracle of population and development? Immigration and its natural increase answers the question. Have the sources of this mighty immigration been dried up? No! they are increasing, and the condition of the Old World, as well as portions of the New, make it certain that these streams will be greatly augmented in the future.

Hitherto this immigration has been diverted from the South by the curse of slavery before the war and by the "reign of terror" that has been kept up by the rebels since. Give the pledge of security and it will flow to the South as it never did to the West. Give them assured protection, and from the farms and workshops and manufactories and marts of trade and commerce of the old States and of Europe I will guaranty in five years an addition of five millions to the loyal population of those States—a number quite sufficient to overshadow the disloyal element and reconstruct, not the political institutions alone, but the social life of the South. With this immigration will come the capital, the intelligence, the enterprise which have characterized the like class in the East, the North, and the West. Social intercourse, commercial and business relations, and varied reciprocal interests will thus be established. A free press, free speech, and free schools will necessarily follow. These will assimilate the society there to that of the loyal States, and thus blotting out forever the insane sectionalism that, fostered by slavery, has hitherto been the bane and curse of our country, we will become in fact a homogeneous people. And here, sir, opens to the imagination a vision of future glory that from want of time I leave with some regret. Each one, however, can fill up the picture for himself. But with the hope that its realization may not be prevented by our want of concert, I shall vote for this measure.

A word, Mr. Speaker, upon another element of this great problem, and I have done. It need not be denied that many good and true men are greatly embarrassed in their action in view of what is to be the future of the African race in this country. It would not be candid to say that this problem is of easy solution from the stand-point of many gentlemen. But it is a problem that I do not intend to discuss at any length in this connection. Time, if nothing else, forbids it. The unsettled question of the equality of races may, for a thousand years to come, form the theme of the philosopher in his study, as it has for a thousand years in the past; but legislation can hardly wait for its settlement. Whether the negro is physically or mentally equal to the white race is not the question here. But the real question which I affirm, is, that each race, and each individual, has a natural, inherent, and equal right to the full and free exercise of whatever faculties he may possess, restrained only so far as to prevent the violation of the equal right of every other person, and that by impartial law. I would establish such a law, and let every one work out his own destiny. I would strike "black" and "white" alike from all laws, making our legislation to descend, like the dews and the rains and the sunshine of our common Father, upon all, and with a like impartiality. This I honestly believe would in a very short time solve all difficulties. But for the sake of those who honestly fear a contest between the races or the possible supremacy of the negro, I will but suggest the fact that of the thirty-six millions of our population, not more than four millions at most belong to this long-oppressed race. Admit their inferiority to the dominant race if it be so, and what is the danger of throwing over them the mantle of impartial law? Weak in numbers, wholly without wealth, devoid of influence, where is the danger? But the disparity in numbers will increase from year to year. The negroes will have no accession to their number by immigration; while the white race, like a great reservoir, is receiving such accessions by millions. In the struggle of life the natural increase of the whites will far exceed the ratio of the blacks. Indeed many, and especially those whose prejudices are strongest against them, believe that the colored race will die out; that it is in fact now in the process of extinction. I do not myself look for such a result, but I do not look for any rapid increase of the race in this country.

We have to-day a white population of at least thirty millions. That number will be doubled in less than twenty-five years, while the increase of the negroes will be in no such ratio. With absolute confidence in the result I here predict and place it upon the record that twenty-five years hence the white race in the United States will number sixty millions, with a corresponding increase in wealth and power, while the colored race will not exceed six millions. Why then disturb ourselves with apprehensions which must, in the very nature of the case, be purely imaginary?

If I am asked why I so contend for the rights of this race if it is to bear so insignificant a part in the future of our country, I reply that it is not because they are negroes nor wholly for their sake that I so contend. It is because I believe there is an all-embracing and superintending Providence over the concerns of men and nations who looks with the same paternal regard upon all His children; and that no individual or class or race can, under His government, disregard the rights of others but upon the irreversible condition in some form, "With whatsoever measure ye mete it shall be measured to you again."

I now yield the residue of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. MILLER.] Mr. MILLER. The gentleman from Ohio yields to me the remaining portion of his time.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. There are other members who wish to speak, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania is speaking in the time of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GRINNELL. Does anybody want to go on now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair knows of four or five who wish to speak on Monday. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. The gentleman from Pennsylvania gives notice he will ask for a vote on Monday.

The SPEAKER. For that reason the Chair desires to hear as many made to-day as possible.

Mr. GRINNELL. I withdraw the motion to adjourn.

Mr. MILLER. I offer this amendment:

And be it further enacted, That no such State shall be admitted to a representation in Congress until it also ratifies the amendment to the Constitution of the United States which has been proposed by two-thirds of both Houses of the Thirty-Ninth Congress and submitted to the respective States for ratification.

The SPEAKER. The motion to refer prevents any amendment being now offered.

Mr. MILLER. I understand the gentleman who has charge of the bill does not object to the amendment.

The SPEAKER. It will be in order when the motion to refer is withdrawn if the previous question be not called.

Mr. MILLER addressed the House. [His speech will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. KERR obtained the floor.

CLERKSHIP OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. BLAINE. With the permission of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] I wish to submit a question for the consideration of the Speaker. In the early part of the last session the House adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That the select committee of seven on the War Debts of Loyal States be allowed to employ a clerk during the present session, or until the committee is discharged, at the usual compensation."

On May 30, 1866, it was

"Ordered, That the bill be recommitted to the select Committee on the War Debts of the Loyal States, and that the same be continued as now organized, with leave to report during the next session by bill or otherwise."

What I desire to ask, Mr. Speaker, is whether, in view of this action of the House, the Committee on the War Debts of the Loyal States is entitled to a clerk at the present session.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that, under the two orders of the House which have been read, there can be no argument upon the question which the gentleman submits.

The resolution adopted December 14, 1865, provides:

"That the select committee of seven on the War Debt of Loyal States be allowed to employ a clerk during the present session, or until the committee is discharged, at the usual compensation."

This would indicate that the House contemplated the probability that the committee might be extended beyond the session. Afterward, and before the session expired, the House ordered that select committee be "continued as now organized, with leave to report at the next session by bill or otherwise." The committee was authorized to employ a clerk until it was discharged. It has not been discharged, and hence it is entitled to employ a clerk, the committee for the time being upon the same footing as one of the standing committees.

And then, on motion of Mr. KOONTZ, (at four o'clock and thirty minutes p. m.), the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees: By the SPEAKER: Additional papers in the case of Madison Newton, of Indiana.

By Mr. CONKLING: The memorial of W. C. Pierrepont, president, and Addison Day, superintendent, of the Rome, Watertown and Ogdensburg Railroad Company, asking a reduction of impost duty on railroad iron.

Also, the petition of Salina Cale, widow of S. V. B. Cale, deceased, for the passage of a law to enable her to receive moneys equitably due for services of her husband as a lieutenant in the ninth regiment New York heavy artillery.

By Mr. HALE: The petition of Abraham Weldin, and others, citizens of Willsboro', Essex county, New York, praying for adoption of rates of duty on wool and woollens proposed by House tariff bill of last session.

By Mr. HUNTER: The memorial and prospectus of the National Petroleum Gas Company, asking for a comparative test of gas made from crude petroleum.

By Mr. LONGYEAR: The petition of D. M. Bagley, and others, citizens of Lansing, Michigan, asking that certain alleged acts and doings of Andrew Johnson, acting as President of the United States, may be inquired into, and if proven that he may be impeached.

By Mr. LYNCH: The petition of Alfred B. Winslow and Eben M. Tibbets, asking the enactment of a law authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue new United States securities for others destroyed.

By Mr. NIBLACK: The remonstrance of John Ross, and others, of Vincennes, Indiana, against a further contraction of the currency and some of the proposed amendments to the national banking law.

By Mr. PAINE: The memorial of Lieutenant Charles Lorenzen, and others, volunteer officers of the State of Wisconsin, praying that the provisions of the act granting three months extra pay to officers discharged since the 5th of March, 1865, may be extended to those who served two years during the war and received their commissions after March 5, 1865.

By Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania: The petition of manufacturers of cotton and woolen fabrics, asking, first, the removal of the five per cent. tax on goods manufactured; second, a drawback of three cents per pound in cotton, to be refunded to the manufacturer; third, to tax all articles of luxury not produced in the United States, and to relieve in due proportion necessities of life, and for other purposes.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The petition of manufacturers of and dealers in cigars and of growers of tobacco, for a change in the tax on cigars.

Also, the petition of soldiers of the sixty-third regiment Ohio volunteer infantry, for additional bounty.

By Mr. WARD, of New York: The memorial of Robert L. May, asking restoration to the Navy.

By Mr. WARD, of Kentucky: The petition of L. Broadway, praying for compensation for two horses and equipage.

IN SENATE.

MONDAY, January 21, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. J. N. MURDOCK, D. D., of Boston, Massachusetts.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. WADE presented four petitions of citizens of Ohio, praying for the passage of House bill No. 178, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, now pending in the Senate; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MORGAN presented the petition and accompanying documents of Charles J. Jock, of Brooklyn, New York, praying for compensation for services rendered as counsel in defending certain officers, sailors, and marines before a general court-martial at the navy-yard in Brooklyn, New York, in 1864 and 1865; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

He also presented two petitions of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; which were ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. SUMNER presented a petition of citizens of the United States, praying for such an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as will prohibit any inequality among citizens on account of birth, race, or color, and also asking Congress to remove, by immediate legislation, any such inequality from the District of Columbia, the Territories, and the unreturned States; which was referred to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. TRUMBULL presented a memorial of citizens of Illinois, remonstrating against the passage of any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or having in view the return, within a limited time to specie payments, and against any law compelling all national banks to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting them from paying or receiving interest on bank balances; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of the Northwestern Photographic Society, praying for the abrogation of the five per cent. tax on the gross receipts of photographers; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. COWAN presented two memorials from citizens of Pennsylvania, remonstrating against the passage of any act authorizing the curtailment of the national currency, or having in view the return within a limited time to specie payments, and against any law compelling all national banks to redeem their notes in New York, or prohibiting them from paying or receiving interest on bank balances; which were referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a petition of citizens of Pennsylvania, representing that they labor under great disadvantages from the frequent violations of trade-marks, and that the present laws do not give sufficient protection against such violations, and praying Congress for relief by extending the law of copy-right to trade-marks; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. RAMSEY. I present a petition of cigar manufacturers, journeymen cigar-makers, dealers in cigars, and growers of and dealers in seed-leaf tobacco, resident in Minnesota, respectfully representing that the present internal revenue tax on cigars has proved to be utterly impracticable, as demonstrated by the present depressed condition of every branch of industry and trade connected therewith. They further state that the present law, being both specific and ad valorem, affords such opportunities for fraud that their business will soon pass entirely into the hands of irresponsible men and fraudulent combinations unless a radical change is soon effected. I ask its reference to the Committee on Finance.

It was so referred.

Mr. HARRIS presented a petition of residents of the town of Clarence, Erie county, New York, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, now pending in the Senate; which was ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. ANTHONY presented additional papers in support of the claim of Benjamin Tilley for rent for land in Washington occupied by the Government; which were referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS FROM COMMITTEES.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 848) to amend an act entitled "An act to incorporate the National Soldiers' and Sailors' Orphans' Home," approved July 25, 1866, reported it with amendments.

Mr. STEWART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 461) to aid in the construction of the San Francisco Central Pacific railroad, reported it with an amendment in the nature of a substitute.

ASYLUM FOR DISABLED VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. WILSON. The Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 227) authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer certain property to the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteers, have directed me to report it back to the Senate without amendment, and as it is very brief I ask that it be put upon its passage.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It requires unanimous consent to consider the joint resolution on the day it is reported.

Mr. GRIMES. I ask for the reading of it for information.

The Secretary read the joint resolution. The National Asylum for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers not having obtained title to land at Point Lookout, in Maryland, as contemplated in the twelfth section of the act approved March 21, 1866, establishing that institution, the joint resolution authorizes the Secretary of War, at his discretion, to transfer to the National Asylum any of the property of the United States still remaining at Point Lookout which may be considered appropriate and useful for the objects of that corporation.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. WILSON. I will simply state that there is some property belonging to the United States at Point Lookout that will be of service to the home for soldiers, and this resolution authorizes the Secretary of War at his discretion to give to the institution that kind of property. It is not of any value to anybody else, and may be of great service to them.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BROWN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 518) to amend an act entitled "An act granting lands to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the States of Missouri and Arkansas to the Pacific ocean," approved July 27, 1866, and to facilitate the early construction of the Atlantic and Pacific railroad; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MORRILL asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 519) to incorporate the Metropolitan Fire and Marine Insurance Company of the District of Columbia; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. HENDERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 520) to aid in the construction of the Kansas and Neosho Valley railroad, connecting the great lakes, Iowa, Missouri, and Kansas, with Texas, the Gulf of Mexico, and the Southwest with the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

MINISTER AT VIENNA.

On motion of Mr. SUMNER, the following resolution submitted by him on the 18th instant was taken up and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, if in his opinion not inconsistent with the public interest, any correspondence between the Department of State and Mr. Motley, envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary at Vienna, relating to his reported resignation of this post.

INDIAN MASSACRES AND HOSTILITIES.

Mr. WILLIAMS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Indian Affairs be instructed to inquire into and report as to the circumstances of the late massacre of the United States troops near Fort Phil. Kearney, and as to what further, if any, legislation is necessary to protect immigrants and settlers, and for the suppression of Indian hostilities in our western States and Territories.

ILLEGAL VOTING IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. MORRILL. I move to take up for consideration Senate bill No. 479.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 479) to punish illegal voting in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The first section of the bill, which was introduced by Mr. EDMUNDS, provided that any person not duly qualified to vote in the District of Columbia, who, knowing that he is not so qualified, shall vote or offer to vote therein, or who shall procure or attempt to procure himself to be registered therein as a voter, shall be punished by imprisonment not exceeding six months, and not less than two months; and the second section declared that if any person, being a qualified voter in the District, should knowingly vote or attempt to vote in any other ward or election precinct than that in which he shall be lawfully entitled to vote, or should unlawfully and knowingly vote or attempt to vote more than once, or in more than one ward or election precinct, or should so vote double therein, he should be punished by imprisonment not exceeding six months and not less than two months, and be disqualified from voting thereafter in the District.

An amendment was reported by the Committee on the District of Columbia, to add the following additional sections:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be five judges of elections within and for the city of Washington, and three within and for the city of Georgetown, the same to be appointed by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, whose duty it shall be, biennially and prior to each election, to prepare a list of the persons qualified to vote in the several wards of said cities in any election; and said judges shall be in open session in their respective cities to receive evidence of the qualification of persons claiming the right to vote in any election therein, and for correcting said lists, on two days, biennially, not exceeding five days prior to each election for the choice of city officers, giving prior notice of the time and place of each session in some newspaper.

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That prior to said election the said judges in the respective cities shall post up a list of voters thus prepared in one or more public places in said cities, and at least ten days prior thereto.

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I should like to know of my friend, the chairman of the committee, what the law is now on the subject to which this bill applies. I thought by the present law there were some penalties attached to illegal voting.

Mr. MORRILL. There are none that I know of. I am sure there are none such as are covered by this bill, and I think none at all. This bill, without the amendments, was introduced by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS.] There are no penalties that I know of for illegal voting provided by the present laws. I would not like to assert that positively, because I am not sufficiently familiar with the laws which may be in force in this District, as the laws of Maryland were when the District was organized upon the subject; but to my knowledge there is no provision on this subject.

I inquire whether it is in order to move an amendment to the amendment of the committee already adopted in Committee of the Whole.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks that any additions can be made to that amendment. It would be in the nature of an amendment to the bill. The amendment having been adopted, it is a part of the text of the bill, and any amendment may now be made to it as a part of the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I move, then, to amend in section three, line five, by striking out the words "biennially and."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair stated, perhaps a little too broadly, that any addition could be made. This amendment, having been adopted in committee, cannot be amended by striking out what has already been adopted, at least in committee; it will be in order when the bill comes into the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL. I thought we were in the Senate. I withdraw the motion, then, for the present.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is, Will the Senate concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole? The amendment suggested by the Senator from Maine would now be in order.

Mr. MORRILL. I move, then, in section three, line five, to strike out the words "biennially and," and in line eleven to strike out the word "biennially;" so that the section will read:

That there shall be five judges of elections within and for the city of Washington, and three within and for the city of Georgetown, the same to be appointed by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, whose duty it shall be, prior to each election, to prepare a list of the persons qualified to vote in the several wards of said cities in any election; and said judges shall be in open session in their respective cities to receive evidence of the qualification of persons claiming the right to vote in any election therein, and for correcting said lists, on two days, not exceeding five days prior to each election for the choice of city officers, giving prior notice of the time and place of each session in some newspaper.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment agreed to in Committee of the Whole by inserting after the word "Columbia" in line five of section three these words, "who shall hold their office for two years and until their successors shall be appointed and qualified, and;" so that it will read:

That there shall be five judges of elections within and for the city of Washington, and three within and for the city of Georgetown, the same to be appointed by the supreme court of the District of Columbia, who shall hold their office for two years and until their successors shall be appointed and qualified, and whose duty it shall be prior to each election, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question now is, Will the Senate concur in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole as amended?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have no objection of course to this bill so far as it seeks to prevent frauds at elections in this District. If the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia is correct in his statement, it may be necessary that there should be further provision of law on that subject. I desire, however, to say a word questioning the propriety of the amendment, which is the immediate question before the Senate. In the District suffrage bill it was provided that a registry of voters should be made in the District by the particular officers named—I believe by the mayors of the cities of Washington and Georgetown and perhaps other officers united with them. That bill contained all the provisions necessary for the purpose of having a correct registry made and for having it put up at proper places within the District, and for having the act given in charge to the grand jury immediately preceding each general or city election. The objection I see to this amendment is that it creates a number of new officers. There are to be five new officers created for the city of Washington and three for the city of Georgetown, upon whom is to be charged the duty of making this registry of voters. The bill does not provide how these officers shall be paid or what shall be their compensation, but as a matter of course they are to be charged upon the Treasury and to constitute a part of the expenses of this District. Now, sir, I perceive no good reason for transferring these duties, which are now charged upon officers of the District of Columbia and to be discharged by them without any expense whatever, to two sets of new officers, who of course must be paid and who, as far as I can perceive, will be no better qualified to the discharge of this duty than were those officers named in the former law. For that reason I feel inclined to vote against the amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. It is perhaps necessary that I should reply to the Senator from Pennsylvania in a single word. This amendment was suggested to the committee by a discussion which is going on in the papers of the District, that the execution of the law as it passed the other day on the question of suffrage is impracticable. It provides for a registry on or before the 1st day of March before each election, and the publication of the list for ten days before that election. The election in Georgetown takes place in February next, and it is said that the city authorities of Georgetown construe the law to mean that they are not obliged to make this list on or before the election in February, because the terms of the law are on or before the 1st of March, and therefore they have a right to go to the extreme limit of the law and say they shall make it on the 1st of March next, and thus comply with the law, and thereby postpone the registry for two years. The committee thought it was perhaps reasonable to relieve these authorities from any complication of that sort; that they ought not to be embarrassed certainly by any doubtful construction of the law; and while upon that subject the committee supposed that it might be quite as safe to all concerned to confer the duty which had thus been devolved upon them, and which they showed so little inclination to perform, upon some parties who might perhaps be disinterested; and therefore this amendment is provided to make the thing certain that the registry is to be made prior to each election without reference to any particular month; and that there may be no mistake about its execution it takes the duty from the mayor and aldermen and devolves it upon the judges, whose duty it is to make the registry in conformity with the act passed by the Senate the other day.

Mr. CONNESS. In addition to what the chairman of the Committee on the District of Columbia has said, I desire to call attention to the fifth section of the District suffrage bill as it passed. I have it in my hand. It reads:

That the mayors and aldermen of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, respectively, on or before the 1st day of March in each year, shall prepare a list of the persons they judge to be qualified to vote in the several wards of said cities in any election.

I do not see but that, under this provision, they may exclude whoever they deem not qualified to vote. I do not see but that the language of the fifth section—and I noticed it when the bill was pending, but it was thought by gentlemen not well then to amend it in the stage in which it was—puts it in the power of the mayors and aldermen of Washington and Georgetown to exclude the very persons enfranchised by the District bill if they see fit so to do.

Mr. MORRILL. If my friend will allow me, this bill repeals so much of that act as is inconsistent with this.

Mr. CONNESS. I so understand it.

Mr. MORRILL. And the language here obviates the difficulty: "to prepare a list of the persons qualified to vote."

Mr. CONNESS. I so understand it, and I regard that as the essential value of this bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I misunderstood the Senator.

Mr. CONNESS. But it was a point to which attention had not been called. I noticed it, and was about to offer an amendment when the suffrage bill was pending in the Senate, but, as I before observed, it was suggested to me that it might be amended in the future, and it passed in this questionable shape, putting it entirely in the power of the mayors and aldermen of these two cities to exclude every person from the franchise whom the act intended to enfranchise; and therefore the greater necessity for passing the bill now before us.

Mr. BUCKALEW. I have no objection to the correction of the former law in both the particulars which have been mentioned; and if the amendment proposed by the committee was confined to the correction of those points I should interpose no single word by way of debate. The Senator from California objects to the particular phraseology employed in the former law. Well, sir, I would be as little disposed as he is to leave the privilege of voting to the mere discretion of the officers of registry. It ought to be a fixed right; their duties ought to be defined; and a provision making the language of the law express in that particular point would not only not be open to objection, but would be highly appropriate.

In regard to the other point, the question of time suggested by the chairman, who says, if I understand him, that under a possible construction of the former law this registry may not be made in time for the election of the present year, and consequently that the law may be postponed in its practical application for the period of two years, of course there is no objection to the correction of that feature, also, of the existing statute, and to saying that this registry shall be made in such time that it can take effect and go into operation at the next ensuing election in the city of Georgetown.

But, sir, the reasoning which we have had from the two members who have spoken indicates an amendment confined to those two points, whereas my objection to the amendment before the Senate was directed to quite a different point, to wit: the creation of five unnecessary officers in the city of Washington and three unnecessary officers in the city of Georgetown. I think that there has been no reason shown for this multiplication of local offices. In the former law these duties of registry were charged upon the mayor and councils of the respective cities, persons already in office, and it charged them with an appropriate duty, one that they are competent to discharge. They are more competent perhaps than any other persons, and they come also from the people; and in this respect our legislation would be analogous to the legislation which takes place in the States. If the chairman of the committee desires the correction of the former law in the two points to which he has referred, he will have my hearty concurrence; but so long as his amendment extends to the point upon which I have spoken, the creation of unnecessary offices without any reason in the world shown for it, I must vote against it.

Mr. MORRILL. My friend is quite at fault about his facts. These are never duties devolved on the mayor and aldermen except by the law to which this bill is amendatory.

Mr. BUCKALEW. The Senator will allow me to explain. What I mean is that duties of this description, duties of assessment and of making out a registry of voters, in the States are charged upon officers selected by the people and responsible to them. That is what I mean.

Mr. MORRILL. I think that is so, ordinarily; but the reason why I think this duty ought not to be imposed perhaps upon the mayors and aldermen in these cities is that they are unaccustomed to anything of the kind, and it may be onerous upon them, and beside I think it would be distasteful to them. Those two reasons put together lead me to suppose that it would be more agreeable, perhaps, to the authorities that it might be devolved on these other parties.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I have an objection to this amendment not suggested by my friend from Pennsylvania. It is that these officers are to be appointed by a court, although they in no way have any connection with the court itself. This is the first bill in which it is proposed, I believe, to confer the appointment of a political officer upon a court. I shall regret to see it done. This court, in the discharge of its official duties, has no connection with duties of this sort, and is not necessarily brought in contact with the people so as to qualify it specially for the appointment of a board such as is provided for in this amendment.

The first and second sections of this bill are unobjectionable to me, if the matter is not already provided for, except that I think the punishment prescribed is too severe. I think you will fail to execute a law with a penalty so severe as this. I think in our western States, at least, the punishment for illegal voting is not so severe, and even then it is somewhat difficult to execute the law. By this bill the punishment of necessity must be imprisonment for not less than two months. I regard the offense of illegal voting as a very grave one; but I think it will be found impossible to execute so severe a law as this against that particular offense. I suggest, therefore, to the chairman that he had better leave it in the discretion of the court to impose a fine or to add imprisonment at its discretion. It often occurs that persons of very weak mind and having little consideration of these subjects are induced to cast a vote by the act of others, and juries are not willing to impose such a severe punishment in all cases. There may be cases in which the punishment of imprisonment ought to be imposed; but in many cases I think it will be found impossible to get juries to execute so severe a law. I suggest to the gentleman having this bill in charge to punish illegal voting by fine, to which the court in its discretion may add imprisonment. I believe that in the code of the District of Columbia the punishment is decided by the court and not by the jury. In the State in which I live the punishment is always decided upon by the jury. I think it would be better to provide in these two sections a fine not exceeding $1,000, to which the court may add imprisonment not exceeding six months.

I am opposed to the third section for the reasons suggested by the Senator from Pennsylvania, and the further reason that it gives to the court the appointment of officers not of the court itself. I think we ought to have the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The yeas and nays are demanded on the question of concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, as amended.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 25, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Chandler, Conness, Cragin, Edmunds, Fessenden, Fogg, Foster, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harris, Howe, Lane, Morgan, Morrill, Poland, Sherman, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, Wade, Williams, Wilson, and Yates—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Hendricks, Johnson, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Saulsbury, and Wiley—9.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cattell, Creswell Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Fowler, Guthrie, Henderson, Howard, Kirkwood, McDougall, Nye, Pomeroy, Ramsey, Riddle, Ross, Sprague, and Van Winkle—18.

So the amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and was read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move that all prior orders be postponed, and that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the tariff bill.

Mr. POLAND. I should be very glad to proceed with the bankrupt bill, which was under consideration on Saturday, but I do not desire to antagonize that against the consideration of the bill which my friend from Maine has in charge. The tariff bill, perhaps, is regarded by my constituents as far the more important measure of the two. I will not, therefore, attempt to keep it in the way of the consideration of the tariff bill, and I consent that the bankrupt bill may be laid aside informally for the purpose of allowing the tariff bill to be taken up and proceeded with, which will obviate the necessity of any motion to lay it aside.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am willing to make any motion that will effect the gentleman's object if there is any that I can make. The bankrupt bill can be laid aside informally, I suppose, and we can proceed with the tariff bill. I move that that bill be taken up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business of Saturday is the bankrupt bill, and the morning hour having expired that bill is legitimately before the Senate. The Senator from Maine moves to postpone that and all prior orders and to proceed to the consideration of the tariff bill. The Senator from Vermont suggests that the bankrupt bill be laid aside informally by common consent, and that the tariff bill come up for discussion. That course will be pursued if there be no objection, and the bankrupt bill by common consent will be laid aside, and the tariff bill will be considered as the bill before the Senate.

INDIAN AFFAIRS.

Mr. WADE. Before the bill of the Senator from Maine is proceeded with I desire, with his consent, to offer a resolution of inquiry:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit copies of all reports, written or printed, which may be in his possession regarding the investigation made by a committee of the Senate, in the year 1865, into the condition of Indian affairs in the western States and Territories.

Mr. NESMITH. As the chairman of the committee alluded to is not present it is perhaps proper that I should make an explanation in relation to the subject. The committee were sent out in 1865 for the purpose of making an investigation into the condition of Indian affairs, and of course, being assigned to duty in all the Territories and States where Indians could be found, their labors extended over a vast extent of country. The Presiding Officer of the Senate, having been a member of that committee, is cognizant of some of the embarrassments under which the committee labored. They have collected all the testimony taken and the various sub-reports and have them printed, now ready for distribution; and it is a matter of which the Secretary of the Interior has not a particle of control, this committee being authorized to make their report direct to Congress. The testimony and sub-reports are printed and have been for six or eight months; but the final report has not yet been made up by the committee, and they have deemed it proper to withhold the other reports until they could make up the final report of their investigations.

I see in a paper which has been sent to me a statement that these reports and the testimony have been suppressed by the committee for some improper reason. I beg leave to say to the Senate that no such reason actuated the committee. The report has not been submitted because we have not yet had time during this session to get together to complete the final report. The statement which has appeared in the papers that the report is lying at the printing office and is intended to be suppressed by the committee is entirely untrue. There is no foundation for any such statement; and without the passage of this resolution the report will be submitted to Congress in a few days, as soon as we have time to complete the examination of the papers and make up the final report.

Mr. WADE. That is satisfactory to me, I was only anxious to see the report because it is a matter of a good deal of interest. The resolution may lie on the table for the present.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will lie over.

Mr. WADE. I have another resolution to offer:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to transmit to the Senate a copy of the report of Major General A. D. McCook, concerning the Chivington or Sand Creek massacre, and other matters concerning the condition of Indian affairs upon which General McCook may have reported.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to amend that by adding to it—

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think I must insist upon going on with the tariff bill, as there is evidently going to be discussion on the resolution; let it lie over.

Mr. WADE. I supposed there would be no objection to it.

Mr. SHERMAN. I simply want to add another matter to it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It can be done to-morrow morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made to the present consideration of the resolution, it will lie over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. McPHEE, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 1030) to regulate the sale of gold by the Secretary of the Treasury.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole) proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 718), to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Committee on Finance have reported an amendment to this bill, which is to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause and insert a substitute. The substitute will be read.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I propose to suggest such amendments as have been agreed on by the committee, and verbal amendments as the reading is proceeded with.

The Secretary read the first section of the substitute, as follows:

That on and after the — day of —, in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on the articles hereinafter mentioned, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on the goods, wares, and merchandise herein enumerated and provided for, imported from foreign countries, the following duties and rates of duty, that is to say:

On teas of all kinds, twenty-five cents per pound.
On coffee of all kinds, five cents per pound.
On chicory and succory roots, five cents per pound.
On chicory and succory roots, ground, burnt, or prepared, six cents per pound.

On acorn coffee and dandelion root, raw or prepared, and on all substitutes for coffee, five cents per pound.

On all extracts or essences of coffee, one dollar per pound.

On all sugar not above No. 12 Dutch standard in color, three cents per pound.

On all sugar above No. 12 and not above No. 15 Dutch standard in color, three and one half cents per pound.

On all sugar above No. 15 and not above No. 20 Dutch standard in color, four cents per pound.

On all sugar above No. 20 Dutch standard in color, five cents per pound: Provided, That the standard by which the color and grades of sugar are to be regulated shall be selected and furnished to the collectors of such ports of entry as may be necessary by the Secretary of the Treasury from time to time, and in such manner as he may deem expedient.

On sugar candy, not colored, ten cents per pound.
On confectionery, made wholly or in part of sugar, and on sugars, after being refined, when tinted, colored, or in any way adulterated, valued at thirty cents per pound or less, fifteen cents per pound.

On confectionery valued at above thirty cents per pound, or when sold by the box, package, or otherwise than by the pound, fifty per cent. ad valorem.

On molasses, eight cents per gallon.

On tank bottoms and on sirup of sugar-cane juice, melado, concentrated melado, or concentrated molasses, two and three fourths cents per pound: Provided, That all tank bottoms, sirups of sugar, or sugar-cane, cane juice, concentrated molasses, or concentrated melado, entered under the name of molasses, or any other name than tank bottoms, sirup of sugar or of sugar-cane, cane juice, concentrated molasses, or concentrated melado, shall be liable to forfeiture to the United States, and the same shall be forfeited.

On cigars, cigarettes, and cheroots of all kinds, two dollars per pound, and, in addition thereto, fifty per cent. ad valorem: Provided, That paper cigars and cigarettes, including wrappers, shall be subject to the same duties as are herein imposed upon cigars: And provided further, That from and after the passage of this act no cigars shall be imported unless the same are packed in boxes of not less than five hundred cigars in each box; and no entry of any imported cigars shall be allowed of less quantity than three thousand in a single package; and all cigars on importation shall be placed in public store or bonded warehouse, and shall not be removed therefrom until the same shall have been inspected and a stamp affixed to each box, indicating such inspection, with the date thereof. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized, to provide the requisite stamps and to make all necessary regulations for carrying the above provisions of law into effect.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The word "kirschenwasser," in line eighty of section one, should be "kirschwasser."

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. EDMUNDS.) That modification will be made, no objection being interposed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line eighty, after "kirschwasser," I move to insert "bermuth."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In lines eighty-six and eighty-seven I move to strike out the words "irrespective of value, cask included," and insert "imported in casks;" so as to make the clause read:

On wines of all kinds, imported in casks, containing not more than twenty per cent. of alcohol, Tralle's hydrometer, fifty cents per gallon.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. After line eighty-eight I move to insert:

On all wines imported in bottles, not otherwise herein provided, two dollars per dozen bottles, each bottle containing not more than one quart and more than one pint, or two dollars per two dozen bottles, each containing not more than one pint.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line eighty-nine I move to strike out "thirty" and insert "twenty;" so as to read:

Provided, That any liquors containing more than twenty per cent. of alcohol which shall be entered under the name of wines shall be liable to forfeiture, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line ninety-five I move to strike out the words "value of the wines," and insert "quantity; and so much in the fifty-ninth section of an act approved March 2, 1799, as provided for allowances for leakage and breakage is hereby repealed;" so as to make the proviso read:

And provided further, That upon bottled wines no allowance shall be made for breakage, unless the same shall be shown to be in excess of ten per cent. of the invoice quantity; and so much of the fifty-ninth section of an act approved March 2, 1799, as provided for allowances for leakage and breakage, is hereby repealed.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line one hundred and one I move to strike out the word "other" before "spirituous," and after the word "dozen," in line one hundred and three, to insert "each bottle containing not less than one and a half pints;" so as to make that proviso read:

And provided further, That wines and spirituous liquors, except brandies, may be imported in bottles when the package shall contain not less than one dozen, each bottle containing not less than one and a half pints.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line one hundred and five I move to strike out the word "brandies," and also the word "other;" so as to read:

And all bottles shall pay a separate and additional duty of three cents each, whether containing wines or spirituous liquors subject to duty, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line one hundred and seven I move to strike out the words "in capacity containing," and to insert "a capacity of;" so as to read:

And any spirituous liquors may be imported in casks of a capacity of not less than fifteen gallons.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line one hundred and fifty-one I move to strike out the words "the passage of," and after the word "act," in the same line, to insert "shall take effect;" then in lines one hundred and fifty-two and one hundred and fifty-three to strike out the words "of not less than five hundred cigars in each box;" in line one hundred and fifty-three to strike out "entry," and insert "importation;" in line one hundred and fifty-four to strike out "imported" before "cigars;" and in line one hundred and fifty-five to strike out the word "package," and insert "case, on pain of forfeiture;" so as to make the clause read:

And provided further, That from and after this act shall take effect no cigars shall be imported unless the same are packed in boxes; and no importation of any cigars shall be allowed of less quantity than three thousand in a single case, on pain of forfeiture.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Section two of the substitute was next read, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on the importation of cotton, and the manufactures of cotton, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the following duties and rates of duty, that is to say:

On cotton, raw or unmanufactured, three cents per pound.

On all manufactures of cotton, as follows, to wit:

CLASS 1.

On all plain woven manufactures of cotton, and on drills, jeans, silesias, and other tweeled or twilled fabrics, not more than four-leaved twill, in the brown, gray, or unbleached condition, not exceeding one hundred threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, and exceeding in weight five ounces per square yard, four cents per square yard; if bleached, four and one half cents per square yard; if colored, stained, painted, or printed, four and one half cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, ten per cent. ad valorem.

CLASS 2.

On finer or lighter goods of like description, not exceeding two hundred threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, in the brown, gray, or unbleached condition, five cents per square yard; if bleached, five and one half cents per square yard; if colored, stained, painted, or printed, five and one half cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, fifteen per cent. ad valorem.

CLASS 3.

On finer or lighter goods of like description, exceeding two hundred threads to the square inch, counting the warp and filling, in brown, gray, or unbleached condition, seven cents per square yard; if bleached, seven and one half cents per square yard; if colored, stained, painted, or printed, seven and one half cents per square yard; and, in addition thereto, twenty per cent. ad valorem.

CLASS 4.

On all other manufactures of cotton commonly sold or purchased by the yard or other lineal measure or by the piece, comprising twills over four-leaved, satteen, jeans, nets, lappet and jacquard-made fabrics, damasked and figured fabrics, cords, beavertees, velvets, velveteens, and fabrics embroidered or tambooured in the loom, not otherwise provided for, in the brown, gray, or unbleached condition, six cents per square yard; if bleached, colored, stained, painted, or printed, six cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, twenty per cent. ad valorem: Provided, That if the duties imposed upon manufactures of cotton, included in the four foregoing classes, shall amount upon brown, gray, or unbleached fabrics to less than thirty per cent. ad valorem, then the duty shall be assessed at thirty per cent. ad valorem: upon bleached fabrics to less than thirty-three and one third per cent. ad valorem then the duty shall be assessed at thirty-three and one third per cent. ad valorem; upon colored, stained, painted, or printed fabrics to less than thirty-five per cent. ad valorem, then the duty shall be assessed at thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

CLASS 5.

On spool thread of cotton, ten cents per dozen spools, containing on each spool two hundred yards or less; and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem; and for every additional one hundred yards on each spool, or fractional part thereof, five cents per dozen spools, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

On cotton yarns in any form, when not advanced beyond singles, in numbers coarser than number fifty, twenty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem; when not coarser than number fifty, nor finer than number seventy, thirty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem; when finer than number seventy, forty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

On cotton thread when not wound upon spools, and on cotton yarns for warps or other purposes, when two or more strands are twisted together, whether on beams, in bundles, skeins, hanks, cops, or in any other form, if composed of single yarns of numbers coarser than number fifty, twenty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem; if composed of single yarns not coarser than number fifty, nor finer than number seventy, thirty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem; if composed of single yarns of numbers finer than number seventy, forty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

On all cotton hosiery, comprising shirts, drawers, stockings, socks, gloves, and all other goods knitted or made on frames or by hand, ten cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, forty per cent. ad valorem.

On cotton webbing, tapes, galloons, bindings, gimps, trimmings, and braids, plain or otherwise, sixty per cent. ad valorem.

On cotton edgings, insertings, and embroideries, and on all embroideries of every material (except silk) of which the embroidering is the chief value, not otherwise provided for, forty per cent. ad valorem.

On all manufactures of cotton not herein otherwise provided for, forty per cent. ad valorem.

On all manufactures of cotton mixed with other material, in which cotton is the material of chief value, and not herein otherwise provided for, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the same duties as are herein provided for similar manufactures composed wholly of cotton.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In lines ninety-one and ninety-two I move to strike out the words "and on all embroideries of every material (except silk)" after "embroidery" in line ninety-one, so as to make the item read:

On cotton edgings, insertings, and embroideries, of which the embroidering is the chief value, not otherwise provided for, forty per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to insert after line ninety-four this paragraph:

On manufactures of cotton, known as book-binders' cloths, twenty-five per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read the next section of the substitute, as follows:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law (on the articles mentioned and embraced in this section) there shall be levied, collected, and paid, on all manufactured wool, hair of the alpaca, goat, camel, and other like animals, imported from foreign countries, the duties hereinafter provided.

All wools, hair of the alpaca, goat, and other like animals, as aforesaid, shall be divided, for the purpose of fixing the duties to be charged thereon, into three classes, to wit:

CLASS 1.

Clothing wools: that is to say, merino, mestiza, mets, or metis wools, or other wools of merino blood, immediate or remote; Down clothing wools; and wools of like character, with any of the preceding, including such as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Buenos Ayres, New Zealand, Australia, Cape of Good Hope, Russia, Great Britain, Canada, and elsewhere, and also including all wools not hereinafter described or designated in class two or three.

CLASS 2.

Combing: that is to say, Leicester, Cotswold, Lincolnshire, Down combing wools, Canada long wools, or other like combing wools of English blood, and usually known by the terms herein used; and also all hair of the alpaca, goat, and other like animals.

CLASS 3.

Carpet wools and other similar wools, such as Don-sko, native South American, Cardova, Valparaiso, native Smyrna, and including all such wools of like character as have been heretofore usually imported into the United States from Turkey, Greece, Egypt, Syria, and elsewhere.

For the purpose of carrying into effect the classification herein provided, a sufficient number of distinctive samples of the various kinds of wool or hair embraced in each of the three classes above-named, selected and prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, and duly verified by him, (the standard samples being retained in the Treasury Department,) shall be deposited in the custom-houses and elsewhere, as he may direct, which samples shall be used by the proper officers of the customs to determine the classes above-specified, to which all imported wools belong. And upon wools of the first class, imported unwashed, the value whereof, at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall be thirty-two cents or less per pound, the duty shall be ten cents per pound, and in addition thereto ten per cent. ad valorem; upon wools of the same class, unwashed, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall exceed thirty-two cents per pound, the duty shall be twelve cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, ten per cent. ad valorem. Upon wools of the second class, and upon all hair of the alpaca, goat, camel, and other like animals, and upon noils, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall be thirty-two cents or less per pound, the duty shall be ten cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, ten per cent. ad valorem; upon wools of the same class, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall exceed thirty-two cents per pound, the duty shall be twelve cents per pound, and in addition thereto, ten per cent. ad valorem. Upon wools of the third class, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported into the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall be twelve cents or less per pound, the duty shall be three cents per pound. Upon wools of the same class, the value whereof at the last port or place whence exported to the United States, excluding charges in such port, shall exceed twelve cents per pound, the duty shall be six cents per pound: Provided, That any wool of the sheep, or hair of the alpaca, goat, camel, and other like animals, which shall be imported in any other than the ordinary condition as now and heretofore practiced, or which shall be changed in its character or condition, for the purpose of evading the duty, or which shall be reduced in value by the admixture of dirt or any other foreign substance, shall be subject to pay twice the amount of duty to which it would otherwise be subjected, anything in this act to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided further, That when wool of different qualities is imported in the same bale, bag, or package, it shall be appraised, by the appraiser, to determine the rate of duty to which it shall be subjected, at the average aggregate value of the contents of the bale, bag, or package; and when bales of different qualities are embraced in the same invoice at the same price, whereby the average price shall be reduced more than ten per cent. below the value of the bale of the best quality, the value of the whole shall be appraised according to the value of the bale of the best quality; and no bale, bag, or package shall be liable to a less rate of duty in consequence of being invoiced with wool of lower value: And provided further, That the duty upon wool of the first class which shall be imported washed shall be twice the amount of the duty to which it would be subjected if imported unwashed, and that the duty upon wool of all classes which shall be imported scoured shall be three times the amount of the duty to which it would be subjected if imported unwashed.

On sheep-skins and Angora goat-skins, raw or un-manufactured, imported with the wool on, washed or unwashed, the duty shall be thirty per cent. ad valorem; and on woolen rags, shoddy, mungo, extract of wool, and waste, the duty shall be twelve cents per pound; and on woolen flocks the duty shall be three cents per pound.

Mr. FESSENDEN. After the word "flocks," in line one hundred and five, I move to insert "or shearings of new fulled cloth," so as to read:

And on woolen flocks or shearings of new fulled cloth the duty shall be three cents per pound.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Section four of the substitute was next read, as follows:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on manufactures of wool and similar materials, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on the goods, wares, and merchandise herein enumerated and provided for, imported from foreign countries, the following duties and rates of duty, that is to say:

On woolen cloths, comprising broadcloths, cloakings, cassimeres, ladies' cloths, doeskins, tricots, and all other fulled or felted goods or fabrics, woolen shawls, flannels, and all manufactures of wool of every description made wholly or in part of wool, not herein otherwise specified, forty-five cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

On blankets and woolen or worsted yarns composed wholly or in part of wool, the hair of the alpaca, goat, camel, or other like animals, valued at not exceeding forty cents per pound, twenty cents per pound; valued at above forty cents per pound, and not exceeding sixty cents per pound, thirty cents per pound; valued at above sixty cents per pound, and not exceeding eighty cents per pound, forty cents per pound; valued at above eighty cents per pound, fifty cents per pound; and, in addition thereto, upon all the above-named articles, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

On bunting, twenty cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

On women's and children's dress goods, and real or imitation Italian cloths, and lastings, and all other similar fabrics, either in the gray or of uniform color, or in various colors or figures produced in the process of weaving, or by coloring, staining, painting, printing, or otherwise, commonly sold or purchased by the yard or other lineal measure, or by the piece, composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat, camel, or other like animals, valued at not exceeding twenty cents the square yard, six cents per square yard; and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at above twenty cents per square yard, eight cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem: Provided, That on all such goods weighing four ounces and over per square yard, the duty shall be fifty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

On hosiery, composed wholly or in part of wool, comprising shirts, drawers, stockings, socks, gloves, mittens, and all other goods knitted or made on frames or by hand, and cloth gloves, forty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

On hats and caps of wool, and clothing readymade, and wearing apparel of every description, and bal-moral skirts, composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat, camel, or other like animals, made up or manufactured wholly or in part by the tailor, seamstress, or manufacturer, fifty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

On webbings, beltings, cords, bindings, braids, and galloons, composed wholly or in part of wool, worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat, camel, or other like animals, fifty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, forty-five per cent. ad valorem.

On fringes, gimps, tassels, dress trimmings, head nets, buttons or tassel buttons, or buttons of other forms for tassels or ornaments, wrought by hand or braided by machinery, made of wool, worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat, camel, or other like animals, or of which the above-named materials are the component parts of chief value, seventy per cent. ad valorem.

On Aubusson and Axminster carpets and carpets woven whole for rooms, fifty per cent. ad valorem.

On Saxony, Wilton, and Tournay velvet carpets, wrought by the Jacquard machine, eighty cents per square yard; on Brussels carpets, wrought by the Jacquard machine, seventy cents per square yard; on patent velvet and tapestry velvet carpets, printed on the warp or otherwise, fifty cents per square yard.

On Brussels and tapestry Brussels carpets, printed on the warp or otherwise, fifty cents per square yard.

On treble ingrain, three-ply, and worsted chain Venetian carpets, forty cents per square yard.

On yarn Venetian and two-ply ingrain carpets, thirty-five cents per square yard.

On druggets, baizes, and bookings, printed, colored, or otherwise, twenty-five cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem; on carpets and carpetings of wool, flax, or cotton, or parts of either, or other materials not otherwise herein specified, forty per cent. ad valorem: Provided, That mats, rugs, screens, covers, hassocks, bed-sides, and other portions of carpets or carpeting shall be subjected to the rate of duty herein imposed on carpets or carpeting of like character or description, and that the duty on all other mats (not exclusively of vegetable material,) screens, hassocks, and carpet, and door-rugs, shall be forty per cent. ad valorem.

On oilcloths for floors, stamped, painted, or printed, valued at fifty cents or less per square yard, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over fifty cents per square yard, and all other oilcloths, (except silk oilcloth,) and on water-proof cloth, not otherwise provided for, forty-five per cent. ad valorem; on oil silk cloth, sixty per cent. ad valorem.

On lastings, mohair cloth, silk twist, or other manufactures of cloth, woven or made in patterns of such size, shape, and form, or cut in such manner as to be fit for use in the manufacture of shoes, boots, and booties exclusively, not combined with India-rubber, and upon lastings in the piece, fifty per cent. ad valorem.

On all manufactures of cloth, woven, made, or cut in patterns of such size, shape, and form, as to be fit for use in the manufacture of buttons, exclusively, not combined with India-rubber, ten per cent. ad valorem.

On roofing felt, twenty per cent. ad valorem.

On all manufactures of wool, worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat, or other like animal, mixed with other material, in which wool, worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat, camel, or other like animal is the material of chief value, not herein otherwise specified, there shall be levied, collected, and paid the same duties as are herein provided for similar manufactures, composed wholly of wool, worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat, or other like animals: Provided, That all manufactures of worsted, the hair of the alpaca, goat, or any other animal, and of shoddy, mungo, waste, or flocks, not herein specified, shall be known as manufactures of wool, and the same rate of duties shall be levied, collected, and paid on them as are herein imposed on similar fabrics composed wholly of wool.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In the proviso in lines thirty-eight and thirty-nine I move to strike out "all such goods," and to insert "skirtings, upholstery fabrics, and all other worsted goods;" so as to make the proviso read:

Provided, That on skirtings, upholstery fabrics, and all other worsted goods weighing four ounces and over per square yard, the duty shall be fifty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to strike out from lines sixty-six to seventy-seven inclusive, and in lieu of them to insert:

On Wilton, Saxony, Aubusson, Axminster, patent velvet, Tournay velvet, and tapestry velvet carpets and carpeting, Brussels carpet wrought by the Jacquard machine, and all medallion or whole carpets, valued at $1.25 or under per square yard, eighty cents per square yard; valued at over $1.25 per square yard, ninety cents per square yard: Provided, That no carpeting, carpets, or rugs of the foregoing description shall pay a duty of less than fifty per cent. ad valorem.

On Brussels and tapestry Brussels carpets and carpeting, printed on the warp or otherwise, sixty cents per square yard.

On all treble ingrain, three-ply, and worsted chain Venetian carpets and carpeting, forty-five cents per square yard.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line seventy-eight, after "carpets," the words "or carpeting" should be inserted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That modification will be made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line eighty, after "bocking," I move to insert "and felt carpets and carpeting."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary next read section five of the substitute, as follows:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on the importation of silk and the manufactures of silk there shall be levied, collected, and paid the following duties and rates of duty, that is to say:

On spun silk for filling, in skeins or cops, not more advanced than singles, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; on silk in the gum not more advanced than singles, tram, thrown, or orgazine, and on floss silks, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

On sewing silk or silk twist in the gum or purified, fifty per cent. ad valorem.

On all ribbons, beltings, galloons, hat-bands, bindings, braids, fringes, gimps, gloves, cloak and dress trimmings, fancy buttons, cords, dress cords, cords and tassels, head nets, head-dresses, neckties, collars, and scarfs, made of silk, seventy per cent. ad valorem.

On each and every other description of manufactures of silk, whether produced by the loom or frame, or in any other way, or further advanced by the needle, whether by hand or machinery, sixty per cent. ad valorem.

On all other manufactures of silk mixed with other materials, comprised as above, in which silk is the material of chief value, sixty per cent. ad valorem.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line sixteen, after "silk," I move to insert "or of which silk is the component material of chief value;" so as to read:

On all ribbons, beltings, galloons, &c., made of silk or of which silk is the component material of chief value.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. After line sixteen I move to insert as a new paragraph:

On silk plush for the manufacture of hats, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary next read section six of the substitute, as follows:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That in lieu of the duties heretofore imposed by law on the importation of flax, hemp, jute, or similar vegetable materials, or on manufactures of the same, there shall be hereafter levied, collected, and paid the following duties and rates of duties, that is to say:

On flax unmanufactured, fifteen dollars per ton. On flax hackled, known as dressed line, twenty dollars per ton.

On Russia, Manila, Italian, and all other hemps, unmanufactured, twenty-five dollars per ton.

On flax straw, one dollar per ton.

On the tow of flax or hemp, five dollars per ton.

On jute, unmanufactured, and Sisal grass, and other vegetable fibers, not otherwise provided for, five dollars per ton.

On all manufactures of Sisal grass, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

On all brown or bleached linens, ducks, canvas paddings, cot-bottoms, burlaps, drills, coatings, brown Hollands, blay linens, Spanish linens, diaper, damasks, crash, huckabacks, handkerchiefs, lawns, or other manufactures of flax, hemp, or jute, or of which flax, hemp, or jute is the component material of chief value, not herein otherwise specified, three cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

On cordage and rope, of whatever vegetable material composed, three cents per pound.

On gunny-cloth, gunny-bags, cotton bagging, or other manufactures not otherwise herein provided for, suitable for the uses to which cotton bagging is applied, composed wholly or in part of hemp, jute, flax, or other material valued at ten cents or less per square yard, three cents per pound; valued at over ten cents per square yard, four cents per pound.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to strike out lines eleven, twelve, and thirteen of that section in the following words:

On all books in the English language, printed since the year 1840, and on all books not otherwise herein provided for, thirty cents per pound.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

On all books in the English language, bound, stitched, or in sheets, printed since the year 1840, and on all printed matter not otherwise herein provided for, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem: Provided, That no books printed since the year 1840 on which an ad valorem duty is imposed by this act shall be admitted for entry at an invoiced value less than fifty per cent. of their retail price at the place of publication.

Mr. SUMNER. Is that a substitute for the proposition in the bill?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir, for the eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth lines.

Mr. SUMNER. I will say nothing about it now. At the proper time I shall have some remarks to make on this subject.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line twenty-six the words "sized or" should be stricken out, so that the clause will read:

On paper, namely, on book and printing paper, unsized, used for books and newspapers exclusively, twenty per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read section fifteen of the substitute, as follows:

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be taken to be the pleasure of the Senate unless objection be made that the further reading of the bill be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. FESSENDEN. With the understanding that it will come up as the unfinished business.

PRINTING OF REPORTS.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, to whom were referred a report of the Secretary of War, communicating in obedience to law statements by the Chief of Ordnance showing the orders given and the purchases made by the Ordnance office during the year ending December 31, 1866; a report of the Secretary of War, communicating in obedience to law the Quartermaster General's statement of contracts made by that Department from July 1 to December 31, 1866; a report of the Secretary of War, communicating in obedience to law a list of contracts made by the officers and agents of the Engineer Department during the year 1866; and a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of December 17, 1866, reports of the assistant commissioners of freedmen, and a synopsis of the laws respecting persons of color in the late slave States, reported in favor of printing the same; which was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of December 19, 1866, certain information in respect to the progress made in collecting the products and also the weights, measures, and coins of the United States for exhibition at the Universal Exposition to be held at Paris during the present year; which, with the accompanying documents, on motion of Mr. SUMNER, was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 1030) to regulate the sale of gold by the Secretary of the Treasury, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RAMSEY. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, January 21, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOYNTON.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTIONS.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order was the call of States and Territories for the introduction of bills and joint resolutions for reference only, and not to be brought back by a motion to reconsider.

INCREASE OF COMPENSATION OF CRIERS, ETC.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, introduced a bill to increase the compensation of criers and tipstaves of the circuit and district court of the United States held in the cities of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Brooklyn, New Orleans, and San Francisco; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. BAKER. I introduce the following joint resolution, and ask that it be referred to the Judiciary Committee:

Resolved, First, that the ten communities lately in armed rebellion against the United States of America, known as the States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Florida, Georgia, Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas, and Arkansas, were left without civil governments upon the overthrow of said armed rebellion; second, that the pretended governments since set up therein through the military interference of the President of the United States, are de facto governments of military origin, without civil foundations, and are not valid State governments under the Constitution of the United States and could only become such, if at all, by being so recognized and declared by Congress in due form of law.

The joint resolution was read a first and second time.

Mr. BAKER. I ask that this joint resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, unless the Speaker shall decide it must go under the rule to the joint select Committee on Reconstruction.

The SPEAKER. The resolution can be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and will be so referred.

Mr. FINCK. I rise to a question of order; the resolution cannot be referred without the question being put to the House.

The SPEAKER. The rule requires its reference without debate.

Mr. FINCK. Without a vote? Is not the House to judge whether a resolution shall be referred or not?

The SPEAKER. By the rule it must be referred.

Mr. FINCK. Is a motion to lay upon the table in order?

The SPEAKER. Not under the rule. If the gentleman prefers another committee he can make that motion.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rose to a question of order at the same time that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FINCK] did, intending to ask whether this joint resolution did not go to the Committee on Reconstruction.

The SPEAKER. The Chair examined it and thought not, as it did not refer even indirectly to the question of the representation of the so-called confederate States, and the rule of the House is that all papers relating to the representation of the so-called confederate States shall be referred to the joint Committee on Reconstruction without debate.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. BROMWELL. I ask leave to offer a joint resolution declaring the power of amending the Constitution, and I ask that it be read.

The joint resolution was read, and is as follows:

Be it resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whereas the Constitution of the United States provides that Congress, whenever two thirds of both Houses shall deem it necessary, shall propose amendments to the Constitution which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three fourths of the States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as part of the said Constitution; and whereas the number of the States lawfully entitled to representation in the Congress of the United States is twenty-six; and whereas the several States of Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Georgia, Florida, Mississippi, Alabama, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Texas did attempt, by acts of secession from the Union and by confederating with each other, to form a separate government foreign to the United States, and by war upon the Government of the United States to wholly separate themselves severally and collectively from the United States, and did openly by such acts of secession, confederation, and war deny all allegiance to the Government of the United States, and did by their several Legislatures and by their several conventions called for that purpose, and by their several Governors and by their judiciaries, and by the ratification of their people respectively, engage in a common cause to wholly subvert the power and authority of the United States throughout all their several limits; and did by their Governors, Legislatures, and people make war against the United States, and continue said war, acting as a belligerent power, until finally overthrown as such power by the military force of the United States in open war, and by that means only did take undisputed possession of the territory embraced in said several States, and has from thence hitherto maintained and still maintains military occupation of said territory; and whereas by means of the premises the said several States were left at the close of said war without civil government, and no governments have as yet been formed in any of said States by or with the consent of Congress; and whereas, to participate in altering or amending the Constitution of the Union can only be done by States of the Union, and is the discharge of the highest function possible in a State of the Union—a function derived wholly from its status in the Union: Therefore,

Resolved, That in ratifying amendments to the Constitution of the United States, as well those now pending as those which may hereafter be proposed by Congress, the said several States are not entitled to any vote, and are wholly incapable either of accepting or rejecting any such amendment, so as to bind thereby the loyal States of the Union, until they shall severally be restored to their former relation to the Union, in full power and competency as States of the Union, by consent of the United States through the Congress thereof; and that when any amendment to the Constitution, proposed by the Congress of the United States, shall be adopted by three fourths of the States recognized by the Congress as lawfully entitled to do so, and shall have ratified in due form of law any amendment of the Constitution by Congress proposed, the same shall become thereby a part of the Constitution, and shall be so recognized by all the departments of this Government.

Mr. LE BLOND. Would it be in order to move that that joint resolution be rejected?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can object to granting leave to introduce the joint resolution. That is the only way in which he can arrive at his object. It is rarely done; but the gentleman has a right under the rules to object to the reception of the joint resolution.

Mr. LE BLOND. If it is necessary to make a motion to that effect I make that motion, that the joint resolution be not received; and upon that motion I demand the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. What is the question?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] objects to granting leave to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BROMWELL] to introduce this joint resolution for reference to a committee. The rule states that bills and joint resolutions for reference only may be introduced on leave during the morning hour on Monday. The question now is on granting leave; will the House allow the introduction of the joint resolution for reference to the Committee on Reconstruction.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 94, nays 33, not voting 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Benjamin, Bingham, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Davis, Defrees, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Kuykendall, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Stokes, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—94.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Boyer, Campbell, Chanler, Cooper, Dawes, Eldridge, Finck, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, Hawkins, Hise, Hogan, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Kerr, Le Blond, Leftwich, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, and Trimble—33.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Barker, Beaman, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Blow, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Dawson, Delano, Denison, Dodge, Driggs, Dumont, Farnsworth, Glossbrenner, Griswold, Hale, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Johnson, Jones, Latham, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Marshall, McCullough, McIndoe, Myers, Newell, Phelps, Pomeroy, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Ross, Rousseau, Schenck, Scofield, Starr, Stilwell, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Windom, Winfield, and Wright—74.

So leave was granted for the introduction of the joint resolution.

During the roll call, Mr. SHANKLIN stated that his colleague, Mr. WARD, was confined to his room by indisposition.

The result having been announced as above recorded, the joint resolution was read a first and second time and referred to the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

RETIREMENT OF LEGAL TENDERS.

Mr. HILL introduced a joint resolution suspending the further retirement and cancellation of United States legal currency notes for the term of two years; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

POWERS AND PRACTICE OF SUPREME COURT.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I ask leave, not being present when my State was called, to introduce for reference a bill to regulate the practice and define the powers of the Supreme Court of the United States in certain cases arising thereon.

Mr. LE BLOND. Let it be reported; I believe the State of Pennsylvania has been passed, and I may object to it after hearing it read.

The bill was accordingly read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That in all cases of writs of error from and appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States wherein drawn in question, the validity of a statute, or of an authority exercised by the United States, or the construction of any clause of the Constitution of the United States, or the validity of a statute, or an authority exercised under any State, or the ground of repugnancy to the Constitution or laws of the United States, the hearing shall be had only before a full bench of the judges of said court; and no judgment shall be rendered or decision made against the validity of any statute, or of any authority exercised by the United States, except with the concurrence of all the judges of the said court.

Mr. LE BLOND. I feel compelled to object.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will it be in order to move to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. Not during the morning hour.

VETERAN OFFICERS.

Mr. HUBBARD, of New York, introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to extend the benefits of section four of an act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1866;" which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPAVING PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

Mr. INGERSOLL introduced a bill providing for the repaving of a portion of Pennsylvania avenue; which was read a first and second time, and referred, together with the accompanying papers, to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

POWERS AND PRACTICE OF SUPREME COURT.

Mr. BENJAMIN introduced a bill to regulate the practice and define the powers of the Supreme Court of the United States in certain cases arising under the Constitution and laws thereof.

Mr. LE BLOND. I believe that is the same bill introduced by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WILLIAMS.] If so, I enter my protest against it again.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I call the yeas and nays on the question of its reception.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The bill was again read in full.

The question being taken on granting leave to introduce the bill, it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 39, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Dawes, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Kuykendall, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Marston, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Stilwell, Stokes, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Windom—107.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Boyer, Campbell, Chanler, Cooper, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hise, Hogan, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Kerr, Le Blond, Leftwich, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thornton, and Trimble—39.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Barker, Bergen, Blow, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dodge, Dumont, Harris, Hawkins, Henderson, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburd, Johnson, Jones, Latham, Latham, William Lawrence, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, Myers, Newell, Pomeroy, Rousseau, Starr, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—45.

So leave was granted.

The bill was accordingly read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

SUFFRAGE IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. NOELL introduced a bill to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate the elective franchise in the District of Columbia," passed at the second session Thirty-Ninth Congress, January 8, 1867; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. NOELL. I move the reference of this bill to a select committee of five.

Mr. UPSON. I move that it be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I would like to hear the bill read.

The bill, which was read, provides that the act of January 8, 1867, be amended so as to abolish all disfranchisement of persons from voting on account of sex.

Mr. NOELL. I desire to state in regard to this bill, that I last Monday introduced a similar one, which was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia. I believe it is a parliamentary rule that a bill should be referred to a committee that will not strangle it. In asking the reference of this bill to a select committee I simply desire to bring the measure before the House. It is a matter of great importance and is at least entitled to consideration. Let the bill be referred to a committee of its friends.

Mr. UPSON. I am not aware that the Committee for the District of Columbia is not a committee of its friends.

The SPEAKER. The question is first on the motion to refer the bill to the Committee for the District of Columbia. Under the rules a motion to refer to a standing committee takes precedence of a motion to refer to a select committee.

The motion of Mr. Upson was agreed to, there being—aye 70, noes 45.

So the bill was referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

DISTRIBUTION OF SUPREME COURT REPORTS.

Mr. UPSON introduced a bill to provide for supplying the State library of each State with one copy of each volume of the reports of the decisions of the Supreme Court hereafter annually published; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

LIEUTENANT JOHN H. HAMLIN.

Mr. LONGYEAR introduced a joint resolution to pay Lieutenant John H. Hamlin for military services; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

TOWN PROPERTY IN GREAT SALT LAKE CITY.

Mr. DRIGGS introduced a bill to authorize the preemption and sale of town property in Great Salt Lake City, Utah Territory; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PREVENTION OF SMUGGLING.

Mr. FERRY introduced a bill to amend an act further to prevent smuggling, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

CHARGES OF CLAIM AGENTS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, introduced a bill to fix and establish the fees and charges of agents and attorneys for performing, collecting, and remitting in all cases of claims for bounty, pensions, pay, and emoluments, where such fees and charges are not fixed and established by existing law, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

AMENDMENT OF THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. COBB introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment of the Constitution of the United States; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

CAPTURE OF JEFFERSON DAVIS.

Mr. PAINE introduced a bill to provide for the distribution of the reward offered by the President for the capture of Jefferson Davis; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Claims, and ordered to be printed.

TIMBER-CUTTING IN CALIFORNIA.

Mr. HIGBY introduced a bill to legalize an act of the Legislature of the State of California, and to grant the right to cut timber from lands within the county of Alpine, in the State of California; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INDEMNITY FOR INDIAN DEPREDACTIONS.

Mr. DENNY introduced a bill to indemnify the citizens of the Territory of Washington and the State of Oregon for property destroyed by Indians in the years 1855 and 1856; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

SETH E. WARD.

Mr. HITCHCOCK introduced a bill for the relief of Seth E. Ward, of the Territory of Nebraska; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. GOODWIN introduced a bill to aid the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Gulf of Mexico to the Pacific ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. GOODWIN also presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona, asking for aid to the southern Pacific railroad; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

ORGANIC ACT OF ARIZONA.

Mr. GOODWIN also presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona, asking for a change in the organic law of that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

TOWN OF PRESCOTT, ARIZONA.

Mr. GOODWIN also presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona, asking Congress to donate two quarter sections of land to the town of Prescott, Arizona; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

BOUNDARY OF ARIZONA.

Mr. GOODWIN also presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona, asking that the act of Congress approved May 5, 1866, setting off to the State of Nevada all that part of the Territory of Arizona west of the thirty-seventh degree of longitude west from Washington, and west of the Colorado river, be repealed; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

MAIL ROUTES IN ARIZONA.

Mr. GOODWIN also presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Arizona, asking for the establishment of new mail routes in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

MONTANA SURVEYING DISTRICT.

Mr. McLEAN introduced a bill erecting the Territory of Montana into a surveying district, and for other purposes; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Territories.

MONTANA JUSTICES OF THE PEACE.

Mr. McLEAN presented a memorial of the Legislature of Montana, asking Congress to amend the organic act of that Territory so as to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

POST ROUTES IN MONTANA.

Mr. McLEAN also presented a memorial of the council of Montana, asking for the establishment of post routes and post offices in Montana Territory; which was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

EXAMINATION OF TREASURY DEPARTMENT.

Mr. GARFIELD introduced a bill to provide for the examination of the Treasury Department, and other Executive Departments; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

SAN FRANCISCO, CALIFORNIA.

Mr. McRUER introduced a bill to relinquish the interest of the United States in certain lands to the city and county of San Francisco, California; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

REVENUE STAMPS.

Mr. MILLER introduced a bill explanatory of the act relating to revenue stamps upon writs of process in courts of record; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now expired.

REGULATING SALES OF GOLD.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee of Ways and Means, asked leave to report, for immediate consideration, a bill to provide for the sale of gold, and for other purposes.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that the rules be suspended in order to allow me to report the bill I have indicated.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read. It provides that after the passage of this act whenever a sale shall be made of coin from the Treasury of the United States public notice of at least four days shall be given by advertisement in one daily newspaper of each of the cities of Washington and New York, designating the amount to be sold, inviting proposals for any part thereof, naming the place and hour up to which such sealed proposals shall be received, the terms of payments, and when and where such proposals shall be opened. Such proposals shall be addressed to the Assistant Treasurer of the treasury at New York, and shall be opened and declared by him in the presence of such persons as may choose to attend at the time designated in the notice; and no proposal shall be considered unless accompanied by a certificate of deposit in the Treasury of the United States of five per cent. of the amount of coin bid for in such proposal, which shall be received as part pay of the coin bid for when the proposal is accepted, or refunded to the party making the same when not accepted; and payment may be received for coin thus disposed of in compound-interest notes with the interest accrued thereon. The Assistant Treasurer, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, shall have the right to reject the whole or any parts of any such proposal; provided that none but the highest bid shall be accepted; and in case of different bids at the same rate, said bids shall be accepted only pro rata.

The question was upon suspending the rules. Mr. DELANO. Will the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] consent to a modification of this bill so as to extend the notice beyond four days, in order that this business shall not be confined entirely to the city of New York?

Mr. MORRILL. The bill says that not less than four days' notice shall be given.

Mr. DELANO. I would suggest to the gentleman that the time should be made at least ten days.

Mr. MORRILL. Every order for a sale will be telegraphed throughout the entire country, and any order which may be given will of course be given by telegraph.

Mr. DELANO. That I am aware of, but I respectfully suggest to the gentleman ten days would be better.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Is this debate in order? The SPEAKER. It is not; the motion to suspend the rules is not debatable.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I should like to know about the printing of this bill. This committee has taken a long time to consider it, and now it is to be forced upon the House without being printed.

The SPEAKER. It is not yet before the House, the question being on suspending the rules.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. That committee has had a month to consider the subject.

Mr. SCHENCK. I rise to inquire of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether it is his purpose to call the previous question if the rules be suspended. I ask whether he will not pledge himself not to call the previous question.

Mr. MORRILL. I will pledge myself to call the previous question.

Mr. O'NEILL. I do not rise for the purpose of debate, but merely to suggest to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that he also insert Philadelphia, which is a city of great commercial importance.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I object to debate.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I suggest to the House that this bill be postponed till tomorrow, and ordered to be printed.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, as he has heretofore done in reference to the condition of business, that if the bill be postponed it will not be reached again probably during this session.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I am willing it shall be made a special order.

The SPEAKER. Then it will come in after the banking bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I insist on the question: If gentlemen will allow it to be explained I do not think there will be serious objection in any part of the House. It is a measure called for by the sentiment of the country.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 73, nays 36.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 115, nays 88, not voting 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Davis, Defrees, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Goodyear, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hawkins, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jencks, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, Moreau, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Montlon, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rogers, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Stilwell, Stokes, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—115.

NAYS—Messrs Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Campbell, Chanler, Cooper, Dawes, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hise, Hunter, Kasson, Kerr, Kykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Leftwich, Loan, McRuér, Niblack, Nicholson, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Nelson Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, William B. Washburn, and James F. Wilson—38.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, Blow, Boutwell, Sidney Clarke, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Delano, Donnelly, Dumont, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Laffin, William Lawrence, Marshall, McCullough, Myers, Newell, Noell, Alexander H. Rice, Rousseau, Starr, Taber, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Unson, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Winfield, and Wright—38.

So (two-thirds having voted in the affirmative) the rules were suspended.

During the vote,

Mr. SCHENCK stated the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means consented to an amendment to extend the time, and he would therefore change his vote from the negative to the affirmative.

Mr. BAKER and others made a like statement.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The bill was then received, and read a first and second time by its title.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, the present bill is merely intended to provide that Government sales of gold hereafter shall be publicly advertised and be open to all who may desire to bid therefor. While such sales are secretly conducted it is impossible that it should not give rise to suspicion, if not the charge of favoritism and corruption. Such a law may diminish the power of the Secretary for sudden and effective movements, but it will at least protect him from unfounded and damaging rumors. For one I should deprecate the transfer to Congress of the responsibility of the management of our finances from the Treasury Department where it properly belongs. We therefore leave the decision with the Secretary as to whether sales shall take place or not; but if any are made the bill opens them to the public at large, and they will no longer be confined to the gold-room at New York. It is only the surplus above what is required for interest that can be sold; and if ever specie payment should be resumed a large reserve would be indispensable for its accomplishment. The amount now on hand furnishes a basis to some extent for the credit of the legal-tender currency; but sell off the gold largely and the relief would be merely temporary, and we should lose all power to resume at all.

There is another view of the case. Under this bill no expense will be imposed upon the Government for any sales; as now conducted we pay a broker's commission. They will be made, if this bill should become a law, under the authority of the Secretary of the Treasury, by the sub-Treasurer at New York.

I promised to allow the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. DELANO] to move an amendment to extend the time for giving public notice of sale, which is fixed in the bill at four days. I will now yield for that purpose.

Mr. KELLEY. I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from Vermont. I have not had an opportunity of examining the bill before the House, and I simply desire to know whether it expressly or by implication authorizes the sale of any gold.

Mr. MORRILL. Not at all; it merely provides that, if the Secretary does sell, it shall be a public sale, advertised for, and that the awards shall be made to the highest bidders in all cases, save where there are coincident bids, they shall be accepted so far as accepted at all at pro rata rates.

Mr. KELLEY. There would be nothing inconsistent in the adoption of this resolution at this time and the adoption by the House, should it in its judgment deem fit, of another resolution prohibiting the sale of any gold.

Mr. MORRILL. Not at all.

Mr. KELLEY. That is all I wished to know.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to ask a question, as I moved the reference of substantially this bill to the committee some few weeks since. I wish to know if there is any limit upon the Secretary of the Treasury, so that he shall not be permitted to sell any gold except when the amount in excess shall be, say, $50,000,000.

Mr. MORRILL. There is no limit in relation to the amount of gold on hand. It is simply a law providing that whenever he does sell it shall be at public sale and of the character I have already described.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire, at the proper time, to make an amendment to that effect.

Mr. MORRILL. I now yield to the gentleman from Ohio, to allow him to propose his amendment.

Mr. DELANO. I desire to offer an amendment as to the time when notice is to be given for the sale. My own judgment is that ten days is the shortest time that ought to be adopted. It is urged however by those who are opposed to that extension that it will give an opportunity for gold gamblers to combine and put the price down. My own opinion is that such a combination will be made as effectually in four days as in ten; that by giving ten days competition we will save the country from any such combination. Now, if I were to follow my own sentiment I would move to amend by making it ten days, but I have so much respect for the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, who seems so well convinced that it is too long a time, that in deference to his judgment I move to extend it only to six days.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no right to accept the amendment, but I make no objection to its being offered.

The SPEAKER. The bill being reported by a committee the gentleman has no right to accept it without the assent of the majority of the committee.

Mr. MORRILL. A majority of the committee now present say they have no objection.

No objection being made, the bill was accordingly amended by striking out "four" and inserting "six."

Mr. MAYNARD. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MORRILL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAYNARD. I notice this bill provides that the gold to be sold may be paid for in compound-interest notes with principal and interest. Will there not be danger that this may be construed as providing for the conversion of all that class of paper?

Mr. MORRILL. Not at all; I do not suppose the Secretary of the Treasury will be able to get a single million of compound-interest notes under the provisions of this bill.

Mr. O'NEILL. I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Vermont. I observe by this bill that public notice of the sale of gold is to be given only in the cities of Washington and New York. I suggest to the gentleman that he include the cities of Philadelphia, Boston, and Cincinnati.

Mr. MORRILL. I would say in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that it was not deemed important by the Committee of Ways and Means that notice should be given in either of those cities, because the moment a sale of gold is advertised in Washington or New York it will be telegraphed to all the cities of the Union, and it would be a useless expenditure for advertising to provide that the sales shall be advertised in any cities except the cities of Washington and New York. If the House differs with the committee I have no objection to the suggestion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but I think it would be a useless expenditure of money.

Mr. O'NEILL. Would not it give an advantage to men in these two cities?

Mr. MORRILL. I do not think it would make a difference of twelve minutes.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I wish to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Vermont. I think that in legislation of this kind the House should be very careful not to do anything which would disturb the currency of the country any more than is absolutely necessary at any period of time.

Now, if a sale of gold should be made under this bill, or under the law as it now exists, which would require the payment by the purchasers of, say thirty million dollars of currency for the gold sold to them, and the Secretary of the Treasury should draw upon the purchasers or upon the banks immediately for that amount, it might create a temporary stringency in the market, which would work a detriment to the business of the country. It has occurred to me that it would be well in disposing of the gold in the Treasury to require the Secretary of the Treasury to receive, in exchange for the gold so disposed of, the funded debt of the United States; or, in other words, that in payment for the gold sold by the Secretary of the Treasury he shall receive, instead of currency, five-twenty bonds or ten-forty bonds or seven-thirty bonds. In that way a sale of gold would not create any immediate or extraordinary demand upon the currency of the country, and therefore would not disturb it. I merely make the suggestion. I suppose the Committee of Ways and Means have examined the subject.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. MORRILL] yield for an amendment to be offered?

Mr. MORRILL. I do not.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I desire to ask the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. WILSON] this question: what effect it would have to have this gold paid for in bonds at par which are now selling at a high premium?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That would depend very much upon the character of our legislation. I merely made the suggestion as one which I thought worthy of consideration, although I did not suppose that the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means would be prepared to afford me an opportunity to offer an amendment of that kind, inasmuch as he had said that he desired to move the previous question on the bill.

Mr. MORRILL. I think there need be no apprehension in relation to the management of the Secretary of the Treasury, because he, more than any other man in the whole country, has the responsibility upon him to so manage that he can conduct the affairs of the Department with success.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to inquire of the gentleman whether the bill provides that the payment for this gold shall be made in national currency or whether it requires legal-tender?

Mr. MORRILL. We do not prohibit the reception of national currency in payment.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is left, then, at the option of the Secretary of the Treasury whether he will accept national currency or not.

Mr. MORRILL. I insist on the previous question.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Before the previous question is sustained I desire to suggest a verbal amendment. The bill now reads "Assistant Treasurer of the Treasury." I propose to strike out the words "of the Treasury."

Mr. MORRILL. I have no objection to that.

The amendment was agreed to.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MORRILL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. GARFIELD. I move to amend the title of the bill so that it will read, "A bill to regulate the sale of gold, and for other purposes."

Mr. MAYNARD suggested that the gentleman leave out the words "and for other purposes."

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well.

Mr. KASSON. I suggest further to the gentleman from Ohio that he make the title read, "A bill to regulate the sale of gold by the Secretary of the Treasury."

Mr. GARFIELD. I will modify it in that way.

The amendment of the title as modified was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message in writing from the President of the United States was communicated to the House by Mr. WILLIAM G. MOORE.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, informed the House that the Senate had passed without amendment House joint resolution No. 227, authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer certain property to the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteers.

CONTESTED ELECTION—THOMAS VS. ARNELL.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. The Committee of Elections, to whom were referred the memorial and accompanying papers of Dorsey B. Thomas, contesting the right of Hon. Samuel M. Arnell to a seat in this House as a Representative of the Thirty-Ninth Congress from the sixth congressional district of Tennessee, have instructed me to make a report accompanied by a resolution. I ask that the resolution be read, and that the report and resolution be laid on the table and printed.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Dorsey B. Thomas, contesting the right of Hon. Samuel M. Arnell to a seat in this House as a Representative from the sixth congressional district of Tennessee be, and he is hereby, required to serve upon the said Arnell, within eight days after the passage of this resolution, a particular statement of the grounds of said contest; and that said Arnell be, and he is hereby, required to serve upon said Thomas his answer thereto in eight days thereafter; and that both parties be allowed eighteen days next after the service of said answer to take testimony in support of their several allegations and denial, in all respects in conformity with the requirements of the act of February 19, 1857, except that not more than four days' notice shall be required for the taking of any deposition under this resolution.

The report and resolution were laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

LATE ELECTIONS IN MARYLAND.

Mr. WARD, of New York. I move to suspend the rules in order to enable me to submit a preamble and resolution for consideration at this time.

Mr. STEVENS. I call for the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. A motion to suspend the rules on this day takes precedence of a call for the regular order of business, for it is a motion to suspend the rule under which any subject becomes the regular order of business.

Mr. WARD, of New York. The preamble and resolution which I desire to submit are as follows:

Whereas by the constitution and laws of the State of Maryland persons who were disloyal to the Government of the United States, or gave aid and encouragement to the recent rebellion are deprived of the elective franchise; and whereas it is alleged that at the last election in the State of Maryland large numbers of the persons disqualified as aforesaid did vote for Representative in the Fortieth Congress and other officers; and whereas it is further alleged that armed forces of the United States were ordered by Federal authority to, and did, cooperate with the Executive of the State of Maryland and others who were engaged with him in overruling the constitution and laws aforesaid, and in securing the votes of rebels and persons disqualified as aforesaid, and whereby loyal and qualified voters of Maryland were deterred from the free exercise of the elective franchise and from resisting and preventing the violation of the constitution and laws aforesaid: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections shall inquire into and report whether the constitution and laws have been violated as aforesaid, and whether the President or any one under his command has in any manner interfered with the said election, or has in any way used or threatened to use the military power of the nation with reference to the said election, and if so, whether it was upon the requisition of the Governor of Maryland; and the committee shall have power to send for persons and papers.

The question was upon the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. PHELPS. I rise to a question of order. The point of order is that under the Constitution of the United States and the rules of this House the present House of Representatives of the Thirty-Ninth Congress is not competent to inquire into the election and returns of members of the Fortieth Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point of order. This House of Representatives can certainly inquire into anything which the House may resolve to inquire into; when the House shall come to act the gentleman's point of order may be made.

Mr. PHELPS. So far as I am concerned there is no reason why I should make any objection to the fullest investigation of the elections referred to by this resolution. But I submit to this House, apart from my point of order, whether it is proper for this Congress to anticipate the action of the Fortieth Congress in a matter concerning exclusively, as this does, the election and returns of members of that Congress.

The SPEAKER. That is a question for the House itself to determine.

Mr. WARD, of New York. I desire to state that I have introduced this preamble and resolution at the instance of prominent Union men of Maryland.

Mr. FINCK. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. A motion to suspend the rules is not debatable.

Mr. FINCK. Then I object to debate.

The question was upon suspending the rules.

Mr. FINCK. On that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 109, nays 37, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broome, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Deffes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleson, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hawkins, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Koontz, Kuykendall, Lafin, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, Melndoe, McKee, McKuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Pomeroy, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Schoenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Stokes, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Window, and Woodbridge—109.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Campbell, Chandler, Cooper, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hise, Hogan, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Kerr, Latham, Le Blond, Leftwich, Niblack, Nicholson, Phelps, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thornton, and Trimble—35.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Banks, Blaine, Blow, Buckland, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Delano, Dodge, Dumont, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Jencks, Johnson, Jones, Kotaham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Marshall, McCullough, Morris, Myers, Newell, Noell, Pike, Rousseau, Sawyer, Starr, Stilwell, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Winfield, and Wright—45.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. MORRILL said: A number of the members of the Committee of Ways and Means were last week engaged in their committee-room during the sessions of the House, and they expect to be detained from the House during this week in the same way. This will account for the non-appearance of their names on the yeas and nays.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

The SPEAKER. The rules having been suspended, the preamble and resolution are now before the House.

Mr. WARD, of New York. Mr. Speaker, the preamble and resolution recite substantially all that I would desire to say upon the subject. I think that members of the House fully understand the subject-matter of the resolution and are prepared to act upon it. I desire to say only that the resolution is introduced at the instance of prominent Union men of the State of Maryland, they believing that their only remedy is an appeal to the Congress of the United States. They believe that the Executive of the State of Maryland, who in imitation of a higher example has been guilty of apos-tacy to his party and to the principles upon which he was elected, has handed over the Unionists, bound hand and foot, to the men who, by the constitution of the State, were deprived of the exercise of the elective franchise, because they had been engaged in rebellion against the United States. With this statement I demand the previous question.

Mr. DAWES. Will the gentleman yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WARD, of New York. I will yield for a suggestion.

Mr. DAWES. I did not understand distinctly the full scope of the resolution; but it seems to me that there are two questions arising upon it. First, it is so broad that it imposes upon the Committee of Elections, if they are expected to do this work thoroughly and as it ought to be done, more labor than it will be possible for them to perform during the brief period of their existence. The other suggestion is that this will evidently be labor entirely lost, for this same labor will be imposed upon the Committee of Elections of the next Congress; for that committee will not, of course, be identical with the present committee, even if it should include any member of the present committee.

While the present committee will not shrink from the performance of any labor within their power which may be required of them by the House, still I think it highly desirable that the gentleman from New York should accept a modification of his motion, and permit the resolution, without being adopted by the House, to be referred to the committee, so that they may inquire whether under all the circumstances this is a proper investigation to be entered upon by the present committee without their being able to make any legal use of the testimony that may be taken, and when the committee of the next Congress would be obliged to carry on a similar investigation, going over the same ground. If the gentleman will consent to trust his resolution with the committee for this purpose, that would seem to me to be the proper course.

Mr. WARD, of New York. Mr. Speaker, in the preamble of this resolution there is a suggestion that the President of the United States has, without any requisition of the Governor of Maryland, without any demand being made upon him in pursuance of the Constitution, interfered in the elections of Maryland; and I think that question should at least be examined by some committee. I felt a delicacy about asking for the appointment of a select committee, because I knew the reluctance which the House feels toward appointing so many select committees, especially so late in the session. I should have asked a reference of this matter to the Committee on the Judiciary; but I knew that that committee is already charged with the investigation of many important matters, and is burdened with more business than it can attend to during the present session. I felt it proper that this matter should go before the Committee of Elections, because I was well aware that it is a competent committee to make this investigation, and that many members of the committee are elected to the next Congress.

But, sir, as I said in the commencement, I offer this resolution at the suggestion of the prominent Union men of Maryland who have suffered everything during the late contest, who have had their homes desolated, their fields laid waste because of their loyalty to the Government of the United States.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. WARD, of New York. Not now. They supposed they would be protected in the rights of American citizens when the war was over and the old flag again waved over every inch of the national domain, but they found themselves, through the treachery of the Executive of Maryland, transferred to those who had been warring against the Government and seeking to overthrow our institutions transferred to them through the machinery of this Government by aid of the President. And they feel this matter should be investigated now. They went to the Legislature of Maryland; they asked that Legislature to investigate these matters, and that Legislature has refused to investigate the matters involved in this resolution.

The courts there, sir, have sold freedmen into slavery in defiance of the civil rights bill. The President is against them; the Executive of the State is against them; the majority of the people of Maryland who have been rebels and are now restored to power in that State are against them; and, sir, their sole resort is to the Congress of the United States. I ask, therefore, this resolution be passed in deference to the sentiments and feelings of these loyal people; and I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will not interpose objection.

Of course the Committee of Elections can investigate such questions as they may deem proper and their time will permit. I beseech the House, representing as I do the sentiment of the loyal Union people of Maryland—I expected one of the Representatives of the Baltimore district would be present to offer it, but he is absent—I ask the House to refer the matter to the committee; and I ask that committee to make a full and fair investigation as far as time will permit.

I do not know of any particular labor this committee has at present on its hands. I do not know of any contested-election cases. I have great confidence in that committee, and I hope they will give their attention to the subject.

Mr. PHELPS. One single question.

Mr. WARD, of New York. Certainly.

Mr. PHELPS. I ask whether any petition or memorial from those prominent loyal men of whom the gentleman speaks has been presented to this House upon which this or any other resolution can be based? I have seen no such petition, and I undertake to deny the fact the gentleman has enunciated that this is sanctioned by prominent loyal men of Maryland.

Mr. WARD, of New York. I do not yield for a speech; I only yield for a question.

Mr. PHELPS. This is a matter in which the State of Maryland is concerned.

Mr. WARD, of New York. I will yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts when I have answered the gentleman from Maryland. He asks if my action is based on any petition presented to this House. I have only to say in reference to that I have had no petition in the form of a petition, but I have had application from numerous Union men of the State of Maryland. One of the prominent Union men who asks this action is the gentleman who claims the gentleman from Maryland has been returned to a seat in this House by rebel votes in defiance of the constitution of Maryland.

Mr. PHELPS. I understand that.

Mr. WARD, of New York. I decline to yield to the gentleman. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. DAWES. The gentleman knows the Committee of Elections do not desire to prevent any investigation into this matter, but will be willing to investigate anything trusted to us by this House. If gentlemen will notice how broad it is and what labor it will involve, I think they will consent that it should be modified.

Mr. PHELPS. Allow me to correct the gentleman's statement.

Mr. WARD, of New York. For a moment.

Mr. PHELPS. The gentleman has stated an investigation of the character now proposed was attempted to be made by the Legislature of Maryland, and that it was refused to be entertained. I ask whether the gentleman does or does not know the fact, as he seems to be familiar with the proceedings of the Maryland Legislature, that the House of Delegates have passed a resolution of inquiry in reference to the same matters embraced in his resolution. So much for his first misstatement.

The gentleman further stated, reviewing a discussion that took place here the other day, in which I found myself a participant, that under the laws in relation to the penalty imposed upon persons of color convicted of crime, the penalty of slavery was still being enforced in that State; and the inference from the gentleman's remarks was that there was no help, no redress for outrages, as he called them, such as those thus committed, except by the prompt action of Congress in the direction indicated by his resolution. I ask the gentleman whether he does or does not know the fact that the House of Delegates of Maryland have, by a unanimous vote, passed an act, which I informed this House when I was last on the floor on this question, had then been introduced into that body for the repeal of the statute of Maryland authorizing negro slavery in that State as a penalty for crime. That measure is now before the Senate of the State, and from the unanimity with which it was passed in the Lower House the gentleman may judge whether or not it is likely to command a majority of the Senate of Maryland.

One word more and I have done. Who are these "prominent loyal men" who are representing the State of Maryland here through the gentleman from New York? Where are my colleagues, who are presumed in the estimation of the gentleman to be considered fit and proper exponents of the loyal people of Maryland to speak for them on a question such as this? I venture to make the assertion, in the absence of any petition or memorial signed by any respectable man of the Union party of Maryland presented to the House, that the only parties to whom the gentleman refers, at whose instance this movement is initiated, are defeated candidates for public office.

Mr. WARD, of New York. Mr. Speaker, I desired that my friend from Maryland should have an opportunity to make the statement which he has, because I certainly do not wish to strangle discussion on this subject. But, sir, I hold in my hand a copy of the American and Commercial Advertiser of Baltimore which purports to give the proceedings of the Legislature of the State of Maryland with reference to a proposed investigation upon this subject, and trusting I shall not weary the House with the matter I ask that that report be read. It is all the information I have on the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

"AFRAID OF DAYLIGHT—INFORMATION REFUSED.—Some of the Democratic press of the State, and many of the Democratic and Conservative members of the Legislature have denounced and abused Hon. HAMILTON WARD, of New York, for the introduction of a resolution in the House of Representatives inquiring into the connection of the national authorities with the recent State election and removal of the police commissioners. Of course, if there was nothing that was not proper to see the light of day in connection with this subject, as the indignation of the Democracy would imply, there would be no objection to President Johnson's connection with that election being made public. The Republicans in the General Assembly, taking this view of the matter, resolved today to test the sincerity of their opponents, and give them an opportunity of defending Messrs. Johnson and Swann from any charges that the resolution in the House of Representatives would imply. Accordingly, in the Senate this morning, Mr. HOLTON, (Republican,) of Howard, submitted an order requesting the Governor to communicate to the Senate all correspondence, by telegraph and otherwise, between himself and General Grant and General Canby in relation to the threatened interference of the United States authorities in the removal of the police commissioners of Baltimore city."

"The Democracy did not at first perceive the object of the Republicans in this move to bring to light matters of such vital importance to the State and country at this time, and adopted the order without a division."

"Some time after its passage, and after the granting of leaves to introduce new bills, at the suggestion of Mr. COMPTON, (Democrat,) of Charles, the vote on its adoption was reconsidered, and the matter was again before the Senate. He then proposed an amendment requesting the Governor to also communicate all information in his possession relative to the threatened interference by non-residents of this State not in official position, which, of course, the Republicans at once accepted as they knew their party had nothing to fear or conceal on this subject."

Mr. DAVIS, (Republican,) of Caroline, suggested to further amend the resolution so as to require that "all conversations between the Governor and President Johnson on the same subject" be given for the public benefit; but this was rejected, it receiving alone the vote of Mr. Davis."

Mr. TOME, (Republican,) of Cecil, was as anxious as his colleague in the pursuit of information, and offered an amendment requesting his Excellency to furnish the Senate with "the official correspondence with the Conservative and Democratic leaders of the State on the subject of the removal of the police commissioners." This was pushing the affair a little too far, and might make some unpleasant exposures, thought Mr. STEPHENSON, (Democrat,) of Hartford, who moved that the whole subject be laid on the table. The Democracy desired to kill off the matter in a more effectual manner, and uniting with the Republicans, by a vote of 4 yeas to 19 nays, Mr. Stephenson's motion was rejected, and after voting down Mr. Tome's proposition, the original resolution offered by Mr. HOLTON, and as amended by Mr. COMPTON, was rejected, the Democrats and Conservatives, with the exception of Messrs. Broadwater, Compton and Vickers, all voting against it.

But your readers will suppose that in the House of Delegates, where his Excellency's friends are more numerous than in the other branch of the General Assembly, such an opportunity to vindicate his reputation from the charges that have been made in connection with this subject would have been hailed with pleasure, and received a unanimous vote. Not so, however, as the result proved.

Mr. BUHRMAN, (Republican,) of Frederick, offered in this body a resolution similar in purport, but differing slightly in phraseology, to that rejected in the Senate. It occasioned some fluttering and surprise among the majority, and was read the second time for their information at the request of one of their number.

Mr. BOSWELL, of Baltimore, immediately on the conclusion of the reading of the resolution, moved to 'lay it on the table,' but, at the suggestion of Hon. Alexander Evans, of Cecil, withdrew his motion, and Mr. Evans proposed to amend Mr. Buhrman's order so as to leave the answering of the inquiry at the discretion of Mr. Swann—if in his judgment it was not incompatible with the interests of the State.

This amendment was adopted, the Republicans voting against it, when Mr. Boswell renewed his motion to 'lay the subject on the table.' Even with the discretionary power granted the Governor by Mr. Evans's amendment, to answer or not, Mr. Swann's friends would not permit it to pass. On the motion that the resolution be laid on the table, Speaker MILLER, Messrs. Aydelotte, Cameron, Dennis, Ford, Magraw, Magruder, Parsons, Shipley, and Spicer were the only members of the Opposition who voted with the Republicans against the Governor furnishing the information desired.

"It is to be hoped that Senator CROWELL, Hon. Francis THOMAS, or Hon. JOHN L. THOMAS, will offer a resolution in Congress inquiring of the President for the information desired by the Republican members of the General Assembly and refused them by President Johnson and Governor Swann's supporters. Let there be light thrown on the subject. Congress should fully investigate the matter, and now is the fitting time. Let a Republican from Maryland look after it and at once."

Mr. WARD, of New York. That is the answer to the first question of the gentleman from Maryland. Now in answer to the second—

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. WARD, of New York. I cannot. I desire to answer the second question propounded to me by the gentleman, namely: who has suggested this thing? What prominent Union man has asked me to present this resolution? I can tell him that Hon. JOHN L. THOMAS is one, and Mr. STEWART, who is to contest the gentleman's seat in the next Congress, is another. And I have letters here on the subject from numerous parties in the State of Maryland whose names I do not now remember.

Now, sir, I say that this is the only remedy which these people have. This is a part of the grand conspiracy in which the President, Governor Swann, the rebels of the South, and the Copperheads of the North are engaged, to restore the rebels to power and to demand and insist upon the recognition of the rebel State governments in the South. The Supreme Court of the United States has issued its edict, has taken its position; the President of the United States has taken his position; the rebels of the South and the Copperheads of the North have taken their position; and the only remedy that is left to the loyal people of this country, to the down-trodden and oppressed Unionists of the South, whether in Maryland or in Georgia, or wherever they may be, is to come to the Congress of the United States; and, sir, they do come here in this form and ask this interference: that the part taken by the Executive in Maryland matters may be investigated, and that the broad seal of congressional protection be thrown over the Unionists of Maryland. I demand the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. PHELPS. Will the gentleman from New York yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WARD, of New York. I cannot yield. The previous question was seconded—ayes 70, noes 31; and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. LE BLOND. Upon the adoption of the resolution I demand the yeas and nays, that we may see who believes that Congress has power to remedy all these evils, if evils exist.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to having the vote taken on the preamble and resolution together?

Mr. LE BLOND. I am perfectly willing that the vote shall be taken together.

No objection was made.

The question was taken upon agreeing to the preamble and resolution; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 104, nays 35, not voting 52; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Deftrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hawkins, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Keontz, Kuykendall, Lafflin, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, Melndoe, Mercur, Mercur, Miller, Moorhead, Moulton, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Pomroy, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Stokes, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—104.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Campbell, Chanler, Cooper, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, Hise, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Kerr, Le Blond, Leftwich, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Phelps, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thornton, and Trimble—35.

So the preamble and resolution were agreed to.

Mr. WARD, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the preamble and resolution were agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GEORGE ST. LEGER GRENDEL.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I transmit herewith a report from the Secretary of War and the accompanying papers, in compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 19th ultimo, requesting copies of all papers in possession of the President touching the case of George St. Leger Grenfel. ANDREW JOHNSON.

Mr. WENTWORTH moved that the message and accompanying documents be laid upon the table and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

NORTH CAROLINA JUDICIAL OFFICERS.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the following message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

I herewith communicate a report from the Secretary of the Interior, in answer to a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 16th instant, in relation to the clerks of the Federal courts and the marshal of the United States for the district of North Carolina. ANDREW JOHNSON.

WASHINGTON, D. C., January 19, 1867.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, moved that the message and accompanying document be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and ordered to be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

NEW ORLEANS RIOT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in answer to a resolution of the House of December 13, 1866, stating that all information relative to the New Orleans riot of July last has been sent by him to the President for transmission to Congress; which was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

SPRINGFIELD ARMORY EXPENDITURES.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of War, in compliance with the act of April 2, 1794, transmitting a statement of the Chief of Ordnance of the arms manufactured and repaired and expenditures made at the Springfield armory during the year ending June 30, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

BOTANICAL GARDEN SEWER.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Commissioner of Public Buildings, in compliance with the civil appropriation act of last session, transmitting a report relative to the sewer through the botanical garden; which was referred to the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds, and ordered to be printed.

LAWS OF UTAH AND ARIZONA.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House copies of the laws of the Territories of Utah and Arizona; which were referred to the Committee on Territories.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. STEVENS. I now demand the regular order of business.

The SPEAKER. The regular order of business is the consideration of House bill No. 543, to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights, upon which the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] is entitled to the floor.

RELIEF OF POOR IN THE DISTRICT.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will the gentleman from Indiana yield to me long enough to enable me to introduce a concurrent resolution for the relief of the poor of this District, which I am sure no one here will have the heart to object to when they hear it read?

Mr. KERR. I will not object if it gives rise to no discussion.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I then ask unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Whereas the extreme severity of the present winter has doubled the suffering and distress of the poor; Therefore

Be it resolved, (the Senate concurring herein,) That there be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000, to be paid to Major General O. O. Howard, to be distributed by him to the suffering poor of this District, without distinction of race or color, in such sums as to him shall seem proper.

Mr. LE BLOND. I do not propose to object to the resolution if there is a reason for it, but I know of no reason for the adoption of the resolution; neither do I see the propriety of placing this appropriation in the hands of this General Howard. It seems to me that if the appropriation is made at all, it would be more properly placed in the hands of the mayor of the city to be applied by him.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LE BLOND] object to the introduction and consideration of this concurrent resolution at this time?

Mr. LE BLOND. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] will assign any satisfactory reason for appropriating this money at this time for this purpose I will not object, otherwise I shall object.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have received accounts, more perhaps than have been received by any other member of this House because of my position as chairman of the Committee for the District of Columbia, from all quarters of the distresses of the poor in this city.

Mr. ROGERS. Of the white poor?

Mr. INGERSOLL. Yes, sir, of the white as well as other poor persons; I have had more calls made upon me from the white poor than from any others. This is and has been an unusually severe winter; perhaps the most severe so far of any winter since 1780. On two different occasions heretofore Congress has appropriated the sum of $2,500, and on one occasion the sum of $25,000 for similar purposes. In my opinion there is more occasion now for this assistance than ever before; and this is owing to the combination of high prices, excessive snows, and extreme cold weather of this season, together with the unprepared condition of the poor to meet this kind of weather. Many of them are now living in huts, hovels, and shanties, seeking shelter where they can find it. A poor boy came to me the other day who had been lying of nights in a lumber yard, and consequently had a hand and a foot frozen.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Will not the gentleman consent to modify his resolution so as to provide for placing this money in the hands of those whose duty it is to provide for the poor in this city?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I have no objection to that.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. It seems to me that those who have charge of the poor of this city will know better how to expend this sum of money than any general officer of the Army or any officer of the Freedmen's Bureau.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The main object I have in view is the relief of the distresses of those who are thus suffering. I shall make no objection to any one of known integrity and honesty whom the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] may name.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would suggest the mayor of Washington or the overseers of the poor.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Several gentlemen around me say they prefer that General Howard shall have charge of this matter. So far as I am personally concerned I have no objection to the mayor of Washington; but as several gentlemen around me object I cannot accept the suggestion of the gentleman.

Mr. RADFORD. I shall insist that this resolution, containing an appropriation, shall be referred to the Committee of the Whole unless some person is joined to the one named in the resolution for the disbursement of this money.

Mr. STEVENS. I would ask if this money is to be drawn from the Treasury of the United States?

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is.

Mr. STEVENS. Then it should be distributed by United States officers. If that is not provided for I must object to it and insist upon the regular order of business.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to suggest—

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] yielded on the condition that this matter should not give rise to debate.

Mr. KERR. I desire to suggest, in regard to this resolution, that it be modified so as to provide that the money shall be distributed by the mayor of this city in conjunction with General Howard.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The mayors of the cities of Georgetown and Washington, and General Howard.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] will state in what shape he desires to present the proposition the Chair will put the question to the House.

Mr. STEVENS. I call for the regular order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The regular order having been demanded, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. KERR] was upon the floor some time since, and yielded to allow the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. INGERSOLL] to ask unanimous consent for the introduction of a resolution. The gentleman from Indiana cannot, unless by his own consent, be taken off the floor by a motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. KERR. I must decline to yield further.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Will not the gentleman from Indiana allow me a word in explanation of my position here? I have been appealed to by gentlemen on both sides of the House to yield to suggestions and I have declined. I would like to state my reasons.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object to further debate on this question. I insist on the regular order.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The House resumed the consideration of House bill No. 543, to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights.

Mr. KERR. Mr. Speaker, it is proposed by the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] to House bill No. 543 to reduce ten States of the Union to the condition of Territories, and govern them, not as Territories of the United States have hitherto been governed, nor even as conquered provinces, but as peoples dependent upon Congress for every right they shall enjoy, whether of life, liberty, or property. This proposition is not only anomalous, but it is startling and revolutionary. It has no precedent in the history of free Governments. It finds no rational justification in the real circumstances of the States to be thus denationalized. It rests for its defense upon a series of assumptions. Some of these are so absurd and baseless as merely to indicate a hopeless confusion of ideas or perverseness of judgment upon the part of their inventors. To such I shall give no attention. Others, equally unsupported by facts and alike void of legal or constitutional foundation, deserve attention because they profess a greater or less degree of conformity to law.

It is assumed in the preamble to the bill to which I have referred that "the eleven States which lately formed the government called the 'confederate States of America' have forfeited all their rights under the Constitution, and can be reinstated in the same only through the action of Congress." This preamble asserts two propositions: first, the forfeiture; and secondly, the exclusive power of Congress to restore. Neither of these propositions is tenable, and the failure of the first destroys the foundation of the second. But the establishment of the first would not vindicate the truth of the second.

How have these States forfeited their rights under the Constitution? The Constitution affords no answer to this inquiry in direct and specific terms. It does not authorize the forfeiture of the rights of States in any manner whatever. It was adopted to form a more perfect Union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity. The high and sacred office of the Constitution is to preserve, not to destroy, the rights of States. When States are once permitted to enter the sanctuary of the Constitution—the Union—they cannot be taken or driven thence, even for punishment. It is made the imperative duty of all the States to protect each of them against invasion or domestic violence. The discharge of these high duties may sometimes, as in the late rebellion, require the aid of such physical forces as shall assume the forms and magnitude of war.

But these facts in no degree change the obligations or enlarge the powers of the Federal Government. The ends for the attainment of which these forces may be used must always remain the same. Any attempt on the part of the Government to extend them will be an assumption of ungranted powers and amount to usurpation. The only wise and noble purposes of written constitutions of government are to define and limit power; not in times of peace alone, but at all times; not as against one department of the Government alone, but against all the departments and agents of the Government and against the people. Attempted revolution against the Government cannot justify revolution by the Government. There is no way by which the limitations on power in the Constitution can be suspended except the mode prescribed by itself. No preponderance of popular majorities can for an instant produce any such result. There is no "higher law" than the Constitution. It is supreme over all within its prescribed sphere. The Federal Government, therefore, cannot destroy a State unless it first assumes the office and attitude of a revolutionist. It can compel obedience, but not destroy. It can suppress rebellion, but cannot make States criminals and subject them to trial, confiscation, forfeiture, or punishment; it can only deal thus with persons.

Once a State always a State, or there is no virtue, no vitality in our system. The reserved rights, or sovereignty if you please, of States must be respected and maintained. I do not mean that theory of "State rights" which is such a terror, in these reckless and revolutionary times to certain men and timid old ladies in this country; nor that imaginary hideous monster, "State sovereignty," which is denounced with such a fervor of malediction by people who know not what it means; nor that vicious dogma to which the South appealed to justify secession. But I do mean that rational and glorious principle which was established by our ancestors as the chief cornerstone of the Republic when they erected our matchless system of government, with a written Constitution to delegate, define, and limit the powers of the Federal Government, and in which they expressly declared that—

"The powers not delegated to the United States by the Constitution, nor prohibited by it to the States, are reserved to the States respectively, or to the people."

I do mean that great and conservative doctrine which maintains that each government shall sacredly observe and respect the boundaries of its own power, and not attempt to encroach upon the jurisdiction of the other; which denies to the central Government the right to invade that residuum of power which is reserved to the States and constitutes their chief value and highest trust in our system of government; which guaranties to them the inestimable and inalienable right of local self-government; which makes them the safest guardians of the dearest, the daily, and fireside rights and interests of the people.

It is this kind of "State rights" which has found a champion in every great statesman and jurist who has reflected honor and made his impress upon our country and our institutions. I might quote from their immortal but now neglected or despised, words and admonitions on this great subject until the sun shall have gone down, but I will not. Out of the very numerous utterances of the Supreme Court of similar import I will cite one only, and that from one of the latest and most solemn judgments of that great tribunal, pronounced by a distinguished judge, who was never identified with the political party of strict construction. He says, in the case of Cummings vs. the State of Missouri, a few days ago, speaking for the court:

"We admit the proposition of the counsel for the State of Missouri that the States which existed previous to the adoption of the Federal Constitution possessed originally all the attributes of sovereignty; that they still retain those attributes, except as they have been surrendered by the formation of the Constitution and the amendments thereto; that the new States, upon their admission into the Union, became invested with equal rights, and were thereafter subject only to similar restrictions; and that among the rights reserved to the States is the right of each State to determine the qualifications for office and the conditions upon which its citizens may exercise their various callings and pursuits within its jurisdiction."

These are honest, loyal, immortal words, spoken in the interest of the people, of liberty, and law. They fitly vindicate the wisdom of our fathers in the organization of that great tribunal of last resort. They bear testimony to the despairing patriot that our country can endure the storms of civil war and yet preserve the essential principles of liberty.

Has the war forfeited the rights of these States? If it had been a foreign war, waged for conquest, we might, upon precedents, but without justice, appeal to the tyrant's logic, that "might makes right," to justify anything we may desire to do with those States. But it was not a foreign war. It was a war on the part of the General Government to suppress insurrection against its authority, "to insure domestic tranquillity," and to maintain the States in their appropriate spheres, and enforce obedience from the people. It was a mere attempt on the part of the Federal Government to execute the laws, and the vindication of the laws terminates the power. This vindication includes the personal punishment of the individual offenders; but this punishment can only be inflicted after trial and conviction "according to law."

In these opinions I am fully sustained by the decision of the Supreme Court in the prize cases. Judge Grier, on this point, expressing the unanimous opinion of the court, says:

"By the Constitution Congress alone has the power to declare a national or foreign war. It cannot declare war against a State or any number of States by virtue of any clause in the Constitution. The Constitution confers on the President the whole executive power. He is bound to take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

The very learned decision of Justice Sprague, of Massachusetts, in the case of the "Amy Warwick," is so directly and forcibly in point in this connection that I cannot omit a citation from it. He says:

"It has been supposed that if the Government have the rights of a belligerent, then, after the rebellion is suppressed, it will have the rights of conquest; that a State and its inhabitants may be permanently divested of all political privileges and treated as foreign territory acquired by arms. This is an error; a grave and dangerous error. Belligerent rights cannot be exercised where there are no belligerents. Conquest of a foreign country gives absolute and unlimited sovereign rights; but no nation ever makes such a conquest of its own territory. If a hostile power, either from without or within a nation, takes possession and holds absolute dominion over any portion of its territory, and the nation by force of arms expels or overthrows the enemy and suppresses hostilities, it acquires no new title but merely regains the possession of which it has been temporarily deprived. The nation acquires no new sovereignty, but merely maintains its previous rights."

There is another paragraph from the masterly opinion of the same high court, promulgated in the language of another eminent magistrate, himself the judicial appointee of President Lincoln, and also having no connection or sympathy with any political party of strict construction, which is so full of truth, so bravely and earnestly uttered, and is so merited a vindication of the foresight and wisdom of our early fathers that it should be graven upon the memory of every American citizen. I beg the indulgence of the House to hear it. It is from the late opinion of the court, by Justice Davis, in ex parte Milligan:

"Time has proven the discernment of our ancestors, for even these provisions [referring to the provisions of the Constitution designed to protect the personal liberties of the people] expressed in such plain English words that it would seem the ingenuity of man could not evade them, are now, after the lapse of more than seventy years, sought to be avoided. Those great and good men foresaw that troublesome times would arise when rulers and people would become restive under restraint, and seek by sharp and decisive measures to accomplish ends deemed just and proper; and that the principles of constitutional liberty would be in peril unless established by irrevocable law. The history of the past might be tempted in the future. The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of Government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false, for the Government within the Constitution has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority."

Of like import, touching the powers of Congress over the States lately in rebellion, is the decision of another of the venerable justices of the Supreme Court, (Nelson,) lately made on his circuit in New York, on the application of certain citizens of South Carolina to be discharged from Federal imprisonment. That learned justice did not hesitate to recognize that State as being as much a State in the Union as the State of New York.

These judicial opinions are in such clear harmony with the philosophy of our Government that they cannot fail soon to secure the approbation of the popular judgment unless we are doomed to the loss of our liberties and the overthrow of our cherished institutions by the mad and reckless spirit that rules the hour.

I claim, therefore, that these States never were out of the Union. Every act of theirs or of their people designed to take them out was a failure or a nullity. It involved a personal crime only, and destroyed the practical relations of representation and coöperation which should exist at all times between the States and the Federal Government, but did not in any just or rational sense involve State suicide or State abdication or increase the powers of Congress over the States. Any other theory results in stultification. It is a confession of insincerity, of hypocrisy, and a covert purpose of revolution on the part of the majority who have controlled the country during the last six years. If its present policy is carried out it will effectually revolutionize the Government. It will prove that we have more power and ability to resist the dangers of war than to guard against those of peace. I verily believe that the most difficult duty ever devolved upon Governments or rulers is the pacification of discontented subjects or citizens. This duty seems to acquire tenfold greater embarrassments under a free Government, because the parties to popular disturbances are the people, and the most potent impulses of their natures become involved in the controversy and obscure their better judgments.

The late war on our part was but a mighty display of the police power of the Government in aid of the civil authorities and to reestablish them. That duty done and the Army's and Navy's work was finished.

The high prerogative of national mercy and pardon is committed by the express language of the Constitution to the Chief Magistrate of the United States, who is by the same authority made Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. He cannot even delegate it to another or divide the responsibility of its exercise. I quote again from the decision of the Supreme Court in ex parte Garland:

"The Constitution provides that the President shall have power to grant reprieves and pardons for offenses against the United States, except in cases of impeachment. The power thus conferred is unlimited, with the exception stated; it extends to every offense known to the law, and may be exercised at any time after its commission, either before legal proceedings are taken or during their pendency or after conviction and judgment. This power of the President is not subject to legislative control. Congress can neither limit the effect of his pardon nor exclude from its exercise any class of offenders. The benign prerogative of mercy reposed in him cannot be fettered by any legislative restriction."

This beneficent power has been exercised in great wisdom and moderation by the President. The great body of the people lately in insurrection against the Government have been pardoned either by general amnesty or special grant. These pardons were all given before conviction. Of such the Supreme Court, in the same case, repeating the language in substance of all the decisions on this subject, say:

"If granted before conviction they prevent any of the penalties and disabilities consequent upon conviction from attaching."

Yet the bill under consideration, in very contempt of the Constitution, laws, and court, utterly ignores all these facts. It assumes the power to punish the recipients of these pardons by imposing upon them most unjust and odious disabilities. In its seventh section, by novel and absurd provisions, it attempts to impose perpetual disabilities and singular punishments upon the States themselves, the corporations, which can no more be the subjects of punishment than they can be the recipients of executive pardon. In all its provisions it is so pregnant with mischief and so violative of correct and elementary principles that it certainly could not survive the test of judicial examination if it should unfortunately become a law.

The bill assumes that the existing State governments were illegally formed, and then graciously concedes to them a temporary validity for municipal purposes. I have shown that no forfeiture of the rights of States, or of the right of the people to self-government in the States resulted from the attempt to secede. If, therefore, at the close of the war these States were out of their proper relations of harmony and coöperation with the Federal Government it was their imperative duty by their own voluntary action to resume those relations. They have done so. They have voluntarily removed, exorcised, from their State governments every hostile or unconstitutional power or enactment, every indication of rebellious purpose, and hundreds of laws and powers before the war deemed legal and constitutional, but now out of harmony with the spirit of the times.

It is further assumed in the bill that these things were done under duress. But this assumption is wholly gratuitous. There is no fact in the entire history of these changes in their local governments and laws that tends to establish such an assertion. The whole extent of the President's exercise of influence to secure them consisted in the expression of opinions and the giving of advice. The people of those States were at liberty to adopt his advice or reject it. That it was sound and patriotic no man will now deny. It was given in the interest of national reunion and pacification alone. It violated no executive duty. It transcended no executive power.

But it is said by way of reproach or complaint that the President appointed provisional governors for those States. He was Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy. In the language of the Supreme Court—

"The Constitution confers on the President the whole executive power. He is bound to take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

It was therefore his duty to know when the war had ceased and the lawful authority of the United States had been restored and established and hostile populations had been reduced to obedience. He needed no legislative action to inform him of these facts. He is the great head of the Government, to whom all such information is communicated by all its subordinate officers. It is his duty, as the sworn conservator of the Constitution, to remember that when the authority of the Government over any insurrectionary district or people has been reestablished, it does not resume possession under a new title as conqueror, but under its old title as the legitimate Government of the country.

In this great emergency, this new and terrible experience of our country, he tried to do his duty, and, in my judgment, has committed fewer errors in action or principle than any ruler similarly situated ever did in the history of Governments before. He found governments in each of those States upon the suppression of the rebellion that were in many respects not in harmony with the Federal Government under the Constitution, and he therefore could not recognize them as rightful State governments in the Union. The people had given up their resistance and returned to obedience, but had not undone the hostile attempts to change their State governments. To aid them in doing this, and to facilitate their transition from a military occupancy and hostile form of State governments to complete voluntary accord with the requirements of the Constitution, he appointed provisional governors. He assigned them a few obvious and simple duties calculated to facilitate the accomplishment of the great duty of restoration. But he did violence to no great principle. He exercised no arbitrary power.

He recognized the great original right of the people to local self-government. In the language of the Supreme Court, in Chisholm vs. Georgia, seventy-five years ago, he held that—

"A State does not owe its origin to the Government of the United States in the highest or in any of its branches. It was in existence before it. It derives its authority from the same pure and sacred source as itself, the voluntary and deliberate choice of the people."

In my judgment the interposition of provisional governors adds nothing to the validity of the present State governments in the South. It merely aided in their speedy formation. Their validity, vitality, and sacredness all arise from the consent of the people. If they had been dictated by the President or Congress they would have lacked the very first principle of republican governments. This bill is a wicked attempt to impose governments upon them by the usurped and despotic power of Congress, in violation of this sacred principle.

But it is claimed that the President had no power to recognize these restored State governments in the South. The continued existence of the States themselves as States in the Union had been recognized in a thousand ways by Congress and every department of the Government, from the inception of the war until this present hour. These States are not Territories of the United States within the meaning of the Constitution, and never can be. They needed no enabling acts to authorize them to reform their State governments. They required no congressional permission to do their duty. It was their office, and theirs alone, to undo as far as possible what they had done amiss.

It was the duty of the chief executive officer of the nation, the Commander-in-Chief of the Army and Navy, to know when these States had resumed relations in entire harmony with the lawful authority of the Federal Government. Without this knowledge he could not wisely discharge the duties devolving upon him in either capacity. He must possess it to enable him to direct properly the movements of the military and civil forces and officers under his control. Having it, it became his duty to act upon it, and be controlled by it to its logical results. He is made the constitutional recipient of all such information in the first instance. It is thus, by clear and conclusive inference, made his duty to act upon such knowledge in the performance of his great duty to see that the laws be faithfully executed. He represents primarily the political power of the Government.

In the Dorr rebellion in Rhode Island, in 1842, the President recognized the old charter government as the legitimate government of that State, and in Luther vs. Borden, a case which arose out of those troubles, the Supreme Court of the United States held that the President was authorized to make such recognition, and that his action was binding on the court. The decision was based upon the impregnable ground that without this power the President could not in all cases execute the laws, and especially in the protection of States against domestic violence, for he could not lawfully determine which was the legitimate State government entitled to Federal protection.

In 1861, just after the State of Virginia had withdrawn from Congress, a revolutionary government was organized at Wheeling which assumed to be the government of that State, although it only represented in part the portion of the State west of the mountains, and it elected Senators to Congress (Carline and WILEY) who claimed admission as representatives in the Senate for the State of Virginia. Their admission was resisted on various grounds. The organization at Wheeling was in every respect irregular, and represented the voluntary action of a mere section of the people of that State. But President Lincoln recognized it as the legitimate government of Virginia, and the Senators were admitted to seats. The grounds upon which it was done are very forcibly stated by one of the wisest Senators and best men then in Congress, Judge Collamer, who is now dead. His views apply with equal propriety and force to the present attitude of the States of the South. Their governments have been recognized by the Executive, and are in every respect more regular and the more legitimate offspring of the will of the people than was that revolutionary government in Virginia.

I beg the attention of the House while I cite, as briefly as may be, Judge Collamer's views. I read from the Globe, volume forty-five page 106:

"There are two difficulties which are suggested in this case. First, it is said that this is a certificate coming from a new government of Virginia, a new organization separated from the rest of the State, but acting for the State as a State. This is in the nature of a judicial proceeding; we are now judging of the qualification of our members. It is not at all an uncommon thing in our highest tribunals that points arise in the investigation of cases, where the court are constrained to say 'that is a political question; with that the courts have nothing to do.' For instance; whether a foreign Government recently commenced has become an independent people, whether in court it is to be treated and considered as a nation, is not a point on which the court can decide. That is a political question; and if the executive head of the Government has received ministers from that Power, recognized it as a Power on earth, the courts cannot go into the question whether he did it right or did it wrong. It is a matter of political action, and the political power is what settles it, and we cannot examine into it any more.

"In analogy to that, in this judicial proceeding, must we not be governed by the fact that the government of Virginia that has executed these papers and sent them to us is recognized by our Executive? They have called on him for militia, and have received militia from him. He recognizes them as the government of Virginia. It is a political question; it is settled. There is no occasion for our inquiring further into that. We, as a judicial body, on this question, have nothing to do with that. Here is the executive of that State, recognized by the Executive of this Government; there is the end of that subject."

But the advocates of this bill and of like revolutionary measures tell the country that the governments of these southern States are not "republican in form," and that "the United States shall guaranty to every State in this Union a republican form of government."

This provision supplies no justification whatever for the monstrous policy of these measures. It gives Congress no shadow of right to dictate constitutions to States of this Union or to Territories. Every contemporaneous interpretation of it is utterly inconsistent with any such idea. Our forefathers never tolerated by any act of theirs any such invasion by Congress of the primary and inalienable right of self-government in the people. In its true intent and spirit this provision is rather designed to prohibit just such changes in the local governments as the pending measures contemplate. Hamilton says, "this guarantee could only operate against changes to be effected by violence," and that it is "as much directed against the usurpation of rulers as against the ferments and outrages of faction and sedition in the community." Mr. Madison says:

"The authority extends no further than to a guarantee of a republican form of government which supposes a preëxisting government of the form which is to be guaranteed. As long, therefore, as the existing republican forms are continued by the States they are guaranteed by the Federal Government. Whenever the State may choose to substitute other republican forms they have a right to do so, and to claim the Federal guarantee for the latter."

In these views Judge Story fully concurs.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what have these States done that is not in strict accord with these opinions and principles? Their governments are as thoroughly republican in form as those of any other part of the Union. They are all representative, with such departmental subdivisions to facilitate administration as have been approved by the experience of our whole country, and they all rest upon the consent and voluntary action of the people. It is falsely assumed that they were "formed in the midst of martial law," and therefore do not represent the will of the people. It is true that the military power of the Federal Government held possession of several parts of their territory. But these State governments were so changed by the people, without any interference whatever, military or martial, as to make them harmonize with the Federal Government under the Constitution, so as to remove every line and vestige of hostility to the latter, in order that the presence of any military power of the Government should become unnecessary. I have no doubt that they this day more nearly represent the will and actual consent of their entire people than do the governments of any other equal number of States in the Union.

It is further objected that these constitutions were not submitted for ratification to the people. With all due respect I cannot appreciate this as anything but a political subterfuge. As to the mode of ratifying constitutions of States there is no settled practice in our country; the mode of ratification, like the constitution itself, must be chosen by each State according to its own pleasure. It is a matter of very minor importance. The modes and practice adopted by different States in the history of the formations of our constitutions have been very diverse. The truth is that the changes made in these southern State constitutions were generally very few in number, and such only as were necessary to abolish the changes interpolated into them during the rebellion, and make them harmonize again with the Federal Constitution. In the propriety of making these changes the popular mind of those States was almost a unit, and a submission of them to popular ratification would have been but a useless formula.

But, Mr. Speaker, the undisguised and, in my humble opinion, most unrighteous purpose of all this kind of legislation is to usurp powers over those States that can find no warrant except in the fierce will of the dominant party in this Congress. It is alike at war with every principle of good and free government and with the highest dictates of humanity and national fraternity. The real aim of this bill is to enable this Congress to subordinate all government in those States to its own partisan will and the accomplishment of its own ascendancy in the country. I cannot perceive a single material result that can be attained by this bill that will not involve a palpable violation of some express provision of the Constitution.

It proposes to degrade those States to Territories, and put them substantially under the government of Congress. For this act no man can show a scintilla of constitutional authority. It proposes to impose punishments upon certain classes of the people in the nature of various disabilities for offenses which were not thus punishable when committed. But the Constitution says "no ex post facto law shall be passed." It proposes to prescribe the qualifications for office in States of this Union in violation of their reserved rights, as lately adjudged by the Supreme Court. It proposes to disfranchise certain classes of citizens by mere legislative declaration, without trial or conviction according to law. It proposes a retrospective and unconstitutional test oath, the principle of which has just received judicial condemnation at the hands of the Supreme Court. It proposes by its seventh section to make the States which shall come into the Union under its provisions unequal and inferior in dignity and rights to all the others, and liable in certain cases to cease to be States in the Union and to lose their right to be represented in Congress. It proposes to make a mere act of ordinary legislation perpetual and irrevocable by any future Congress. It proposes by a sort of legislative supplement to the Constitution to declare what sort of laws and constitutions the States shall hereafter make. Let me read this seventh section:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That no constitution shall be presented to or acted on by Congress which denies to any citizen any right, privileges, or immunities which are granted to any other citizen in the State. All laws shall be impartial, without regard to language, race, or former condition. If the provisions of this section should ever be altered, repealed, expunged, or in any way abrogated, this act shall become void and said State lose its right to be represented in Congress.

Now, Mr. Speaker, are we to believe that our revolutionary sires, after their long and bloody struggles with tyrants and tyranny, so little understood the logic of either as to intrust such dangerous powers as these to any department of the Government? No, never; they had learned the value and necessity for written constitutions, that should be supreme law alike to rulers and people.

But this bill attempts to prescribe the qualifications for voting in those States, in violation of another express provision of the Constitution. And here is disclosed another of the cherished purposes of the dominant party in such legislation. They are determined to confer universal suffrage on the negroes of the South. Very few men of any intelligence will yet claim for Congress the power to go into the northern States of the Union and prescribe the qualifications for suffrage in them. Yet no more power exists in Congress to regulate suffrage in the States of the South than in those of the North. No man can produce a line of respectable authority for either. During the last session of this Congress I discussed this subject in this House with reference to the authorities bearing upon it, and I now refer to what I then said. I now merely repeat that all power over this subject resides in the States alone. Whether and when and upon what terms the negro may exercise the right of suffrage each State has the right to settle for itself.

The venerable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM,] in his able speech on this bill, indulged in some very startling propositions that seem to me not to be very consistent with his opposition to the bill. If I were compelled to choose between his theory of Federal power over the southern States and the bill itself I think I would prefer the latter, as being, if possible, the least dangerous and revolutionary. He assumes that the States represented in this House alone "are the nation," and that "there is no American nationality" outside of them, and that the States to be affected by this bill "have no power to legislate upon any subject affecting the life, liberty, or property of an American citizen, save by the sufferance of the American nation," and that "by their rebellion they ceased to possess the power or legal coercive force for local State government." I am not sure that my acquaintance with the political vocabulary of the Radicals is sufficient to enable me to understand just what all this means. But I think I am safe in assuming that it means that the Radical party have the power and intend to exercise it to govern this country without the aid of the unrepresented States, the Constitution, or the Supreme Court.

If the unrepresented States are no part of the "nation," it readily follows that they need not be counted in ratifying the proposed constitutional amendments. It is not so clear where the United States obtains power to govern States that are no part of the "nation." This whole doctrine is utterly subversive of the principles of constitutional government. I think I have already sufficiently answered it. It is not sustained by a single respectable authority in the political or judicial history of our Government. If it is, why are they not presented for our consideration? In so grave a matter as the proposed congressional government of States, there should be taken the utmost care to vindicate both its propriety and constitutionality. The learned gentleman from Ohio assumes that there is some countenance given to his theory in the decisions of the Supreme Court in Luther vs. Borden, and in the prize cases. I am wholly unable to find any authority whatever in either of those cases to justify any such dogma. But I do find in them ample vindication for the positions I have endeavored to maintain, and I have cited from those cases.

In truth, the whole course of decisions upon constitutional questions in that court, and especially those lately promulgated, are in irreconcilable conflict with all the leading measures and policy of the dominant party in Congress, and by the plainest logical sequence pronounce judgment of condemnation against them all in advance. Hence arises the growing hostility of radicalism toward that great tribunal. The country may well anticipate an early attempt by the radical despotism that now claims to be the "nation" and to measure its power by its own will to reduce that last citadel of national safety to its control, and to make the judges mere clerks to record as law the edicts of party and caucus. The gentleman from Ohio has pointed out the way. He suggests to his co-workers that they "sweep away at once its appellate jurisdiction in all cases," and thus take from it nearly every opportunity to pass upon the unconstitutional measures of his party. But if the court should still, as often as its remaining jurisdiction might afford it proper occasion, put the seal of judicial condemnation upon the lawless doings of his party, then he invites you to seek its final destruction. Hear his summons, and let the country hear it and take warning of our danger:

"If, however, the court usurps power to decide political questions and defy a free people's will, it will only remain for a people thus insulted and defied to demonstrate that the servant is not above his lord, by procuring a further constitutional amendment and ratifying the same, which will defy judicial usurpation by annihilating the usurpers in the abolition of the tribunal itself."

Yes, if the Supreme Court, a coördinate department of this Government, gets in the way of radicalism it must be destroyed. It must not be allowed to insult a "free people's will" by the faithful discharge of its duty under the Constitution. If the President, the representative of another coördinate department of the Government, gets in the way of radicalism he, too, must be disposed of. Congress must be king; it is the "nation." Constitutions must be remade, modified, or abolished if the exigencies of party demand it. And this must be done by a part only of the States, such a part as the party is willing to hear. We hear a great deal about the "American nationality," and "the nation," and the "people's will," and "the life of the Republic," and "a politic personality," and other transcendental terms and phrases, but they are all intended to operate upon the people, as a sort of political mirage, to inspire them with false hopes and lead them into political chaos or despotism.

Mr. Speaker, when I reflect upon these most extraordinary assumptions of power and most revolutionary threats against the integrity of the Constitution my heart sinks within me, and I almost despair for the Republic and for the preservation of liberty in our country. If we are to be saved from such a fate, it must needs be by an interposition of Divine Providence to arouse the people to a consciousness of their great perils.

Mr. HIGBY obtained the floor.

BELIEF OF POOR IN THE DISTRICT—AGAIN.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] kindly consents to yield to me that I may have another opportunity to present the joint resolution appropriating $25,000 for the relief of the poor of this District.

Mr. HIGBY. Provided that it gives rise to no debate.

The SPEAKER. In what shape does the gentleman from Illinois now present his proposition?

Mr. INGERSOLL. In order that the resolution may go through without opposition I have consented to modify it so that the distribution of the fund shall be under the control of General Howard and the mayor of Washington.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the introduction of the resolution?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object to it in its present form, though I am willing it shall be introduced and passed in the form in which the gentleman originally presented it.

MRS. MARY WEBBER.

Mr. CULVER, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution for the relief of Mrs. Sarah Webber, late postmistress at Franklin, Pennsylvania; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. TROWBRIDGE, from the Committee on Enrolled bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled a joint resolution (H. R. No. 227) authorizing the Secretary of War to transfer certain property to the National Asylum for Disabled Volunteers; whereupon the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 479) entitled "An act to punish illegal voting in the District of Columbia, and for other purposes," in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

BELIEF OF POOR IN THE DISTRICT—AGAIN.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I withdraw my objection to the introduction of the resolution of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. INGERSOLL.]

Mr. STEVENS. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois that he modify his resolution by inserting after the word "sums" the words "and commodities," so as to read "in such sums and commodities as to them shall seem proper."

Mr. McKEE. I object to the introduction of the resolution in its present form.

WHIPPINGS IN NORTH CAROLINA.

Mr. FARQUHAR, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the select committee heretofore authorized by this House to investigate the facts in the case of certain murderers in South Carolina who were discharged by writ of habeas corpus, be, and are hereby, instructed further to investigate and report the facts of alleged punishment by publicly whipping citizens of the United States in North Carolina, and particularly at Raleigh and vicinity, and the burning alive of citizens in South Carolina while confined or imprisoned in jail.

EDWARD LUSHER.

Mr. GRISWOLD, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the relief of Edward Lusher; which was read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REDEMPTION OF SMALL COINS.

Mr. KETCHAM, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law that coins of the denomination of one, of two, of three, and of five cents shall be redeemable at the offices of the Treasurer and Assistant Treasurer of the United States when presented in sums of not less than ten dollars.

BELIEF OF POOR IN THE DISTRICT—AGAIN.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I again ask unanimous consent to submit a joint resolution for the relief of the suffering poor of the District of Columbia.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I hope the gentleman will yield to me to move to insert the name of the mayor of Georgetown.

Mr. INGERSOLL. It is in the District of Columbia and is already included. I move the resolution now with the names of General Howard and Mayor Wallach.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. If the joint resolution be presented in that form there will be no objection on this side of the House.

Mr. McKEE. I object.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Can I move a suspension of the rules?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not the floor to make such a motion, another subject, the regular order, being pending.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Can I not move to postpone it?

Objection was made.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state, in reference to the reconstruction bill, that if postponed without being made a special order it may not again come up this session.

RECONSTRUCTION.

The House then resumed the consideration of House bill No. 543, to provide for restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights, on which the gentleman from California [Mr. HIGBY] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. STEVENS. The gentleman from California yielded to me for a few moments. I propose to call for the vote on the pending bill to-morrow at one o'clock p. m. I now give that notice.

I will move, as there are several gentlemen who wish to speak, that there be an evening session. I trust we will take a recess until half past seven o'clock p. m., and that the evening session be devoted to debate only. I move that the recess begin at the close of the hour of the gentleman from California.

There was no objection; and the motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent it was agreed that at the close of the evening session Mr. STEVENS should be considered as holding the floor.

Mr. HIGBY. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Reconstruction, appointed early in the last session of Congress, reported an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which they recommended should be submitted for ratification to the several States of the Union; and accompanying that amendment they also reported a bill to provide for restoring the States lately in rebellion to their full political rights. The preamble of that bill recites the constitutional amendment to which I have referred, and then proceeds to enact as follows:

"Now, therefore,

"Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That whenever the above-recited amendment shall have become part of the Constitution of the United States, and any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the same, and shall have modified its constitution and laws in conformity therewith, the Senators and Representatives from such State, if found duly elected and qualified, may, after having taken the required oaths of office, be admitted into Congress as such.

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That when any State lately in insurrection shall have ratified the foregoing amendment to the Constitution, any part of the direct tax under the act of August 5, 1861, which may remain due and unpaid in such State may be assumed and paid by such State; and the payment thereof, upon proper assurances from such State, to be given to the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, may be postponed for a period not exceeding ten years from and after the passage of this act."

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that that bill is now before the House, that it has received no action, and that the amendments which have been proposed by the member from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] are in the nature of a substitute. I can readily account for the position which was occupied by the distinguished member from Ohio, [Mr. BINGHAM], also a member of the committee, and understand why he adhered with tenacity to the ground taken by that committee one year ago. I think I can see a reason why the committee also should oppose the amendment presented by the member from Pennsylvania. The bill and amendment being reported by the committee no doubt received the sanction of this committee, and having received that sanction we have no reason for supposing that as yet there is any change of sentiment upon this question of reconstruction in the committee of fifteen.

Mr. Speaker, the House does not stand committed to the position that was occupied by that committee. And I will say here in advance that while as between the original bill and the amendment I would by all means support the latter, yet I am prepared to sustain a bill some other than the one recommended by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, provided it has incorporated in it the main principles that are contained in that. Rather than have nothing I will support the bill that he has presented with the amendments that have been proposed to it. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] has proposed an amendment which has been accepted by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, which, in my judgment, much improves the bill as it came to us from his hands. It must be borne in mind that the amendment to the Constitution as proposed by that committee was much changed in its features here in the House, and after going to the Senate it there received a material modification, and when it came back to the House we passed it at once as amended by the Senate. By simply turning over one leaf in the committee's report we find what the article was as it passed both House and Senate. We are told not only that this House is committed to the policy adopted by that committee, but that in the political campaign last fall the constitutional amendment was declared to be a final measure of reconstruction, and that it was sent out to the States by Congress for ratification as such final measure.

I have made this statement of the history of this matter and of the position which the Committee on Reconstruction occupied. We have no assurance that the committee would report anything different from what they have already reported to this House, and yet if I am not mistaken this bill is now before the House on a motion to recommit to the Committee on Reconstruction. Sir, the House had better consider before it makes that disposition of it. We should rather retain it here before us, where we can change, mature, and finally pass it and send it to the Senate. The Thirty-Ninth Congress has made no progress on the question of reconstruction. This House will not pass a bill in accordance with this portion of the amendment. The Senate would pass no such bill. The House and Senate both stand committed to an entirely different policy of reconstruction from what is contained in that amendment.

And how does it happen that we have made no progress? It is not the fault of Congress; it is not the fault of the members of either branch of Congress. When Congress met in December, 1865, it found that the President of the United States had been busy during the long recess in building up State governments in every one of the States that had been in rebellion. I say States for convenience sake, though my judgment is that not one of the ten insurgent States has a government at this time with a single element of loyalty in it, or an element that constitutes a State. They saw fit to sever their connection with the Federal Government; they denied all allegiance to it, and fought for four years at great sacrifice of life and expenditure of money to maintain their separation, and it is proper that the General Government should take them at their word and say that they have no State governments under the Constitution of the United States until such time as their true and proper relationship can be permanently settled. I hold at the same time that the territory which they inhabit belongs to the Government of the United States, is within its dominion and subject to its control.

The President of the United States told us in his annual message of December, 1865, that the work of reconstruction was all done; that the insurgent States were restored and reinstated, and would send their members to Congress; and that Congress had only to pass upon the questions of election and qualification of the members from the several States. Thus was Congress frustrated in its work. The President by what I call an act of usurpation, had presumed to do all this work, and he has been struggling ever since to force his policy upon the country on the ground that he had the power to do this work and it did not belong to Congress. Had the Executive been in accord with this Congress at the commencement of its first session there would have been some progress in the work of reconstruction.

But, sir, how do we stand to-day? What is the position of the Government? What is the sentiment already expressed, crystallized into the form of law? The constitutional amendment when it is adopted becomes of binding effect only upon States that have representation in Congress. It applies to States and States only. Then look at our recent legislation. Only a few days ago loyal Nebraska and Colorado came and asked to be received as States into the Union. What was done in the Senate? A section was annexed by way of amendment that impartial suffrage should be the rule within each of those Territories when they became States. When it came to the House it was amended, the object being to make it more secure, more certain, and more valid; but the strong expression of this body was that neither of those Territories could come in as a State unless impartial suffrage were tolerated in each. That is the principle that was promulgated in the Senate; that is the principle that has been promulgated here; and a few days previous to taking that vote it was voted in this House that impartial suffrage should be the rule in every one of the Territories within the limits of the United States.

Well, sir, the insurgent States of which I have been speaking are no better than Territories in their position. Are we to wait until this amendment be ratified by them or made a part of the Constitution by the States represented in Congress, and then make that the direct basis of reconstruction? Shall South Carolina, upon the terms that are required by that amendment, come here and ask for admission as a State into this Union, and her Representatives be allowed upon this floor? Shall she be allowed to come here and act as if she were a State while she excludes from suffrage her colored population, which is equal to her white population? Is she to be admitted to representation simply upon conforming to the terms of the amendment, exercising the right herself to exclude colored suffrage? Would this House dare to vote to admit her as a State into this Union under such circumstances? Would it not be an absurdity in our action that would make this Congress a laughing stock in the eye of the whole country if rebel South Carolina should be placed upon a better or any other footing than loyal Colorado and Nebraska is placed? Impartial suffrage is required of each of those Territories as a condition precedent to their becoming States; and shall South Carolina, upon this basis of reconstruction, become a part of this Union upon different terms and principles entirely from those implied by the votes we have just given?

My own judgment is that neither this House nor the Senate will ever support such a proposition as that. Sir, this nation has advanced in one year's time, and will not now, I cannot believe, sustain the position assumed by the Committee on Reconstruction in the original bill to which the one under consideration is a substitute.

Suppose, Mr. Speaker, we carry out this idea of making the constitutional amendment the direct basis upon which reconstruction shall depend; the States that were restored or reestablished under the policy of the President went into the hands, as civil powers, of the very men that Grant and Sherman disarmed in the final struggle. While they were thus being disarmed of their military power the President of the United States was arming them with civil power by his plan of restoration. Such was the condition of every one of the States which he had remodeled and in which he had established governments, and such is their condition to-day. Every one of them, so far as they had any governmental action, was then manifesting its hostility to the Government of the United States. There was but one of the rebellious States that was an exception to this rule, and that State was not reorganized under his policy. I refer to the State of Tennessee. That State was reorganized and formed a State government before he became President of the United States. And, sir, where it is attempted to be argued that Tennessee is a precedent for action in these other cases the analogy fails. There there was loyalty; there there was devotion to the Government; although, let me say, I did not vote for the readmission of Tennessee because that State failed to acknowledge one great principle that now, at this session of Congress, is sustained by large majorities at both ends of the Capitol, namely, impartial suffrage. But the State was in the hands of loyal men; it had exhibited its devotion to the Government and its readiness to obey the laws; its Legislature had ratified the amendment proposed to the Constitution prohibiting slavery and the one passed or proposed last session, and Congress therefore readmitted Tennessee and received her representatives.

But, sir, take this policy of reconstruction based upon the adoption of this constitutional amendment, and what then? South Carolina, because there is no power to dictate to that State a change in its constitution, comes here with the same constitution that it now has, comes here with the same men in power that are now in power and have been for a year past, and with the same laws and despotic rules that are now crushing down the loyal men of that State; and we must admit South Carolina in her present condition! That is the position that has been urged here and is alleged to have been urged in various congressional districts throughout the country. We will find ourselves with our hands tied, and compelled to foist and fasten upon the Government of this country this State government of a most odious character; and this is only one of these State governments of the same character; I have mentioned it merely as an example. There never was a commitment of this branch of Congress to any such position. I deny it emphatically.

Mr. Speaker, I spoke in the outset very briefly of this bill. I have read it and reread it. I confess that the second section of this bill was objectionable to me. But the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. STEVENS] withdrew that section, leaving it no part of the bill, when very great objection was made to it by one or two members. But after that was done the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BAKER] went on to make a very fierce onslaught upon the sixth section of the bill, simply upon the ground that it proposed to place these southern people in the position of foreigners, and requiring them to go through the process of naturalization before they could again exercise the right of citizenship. That was the ground the gentleman took. Will he for a moment deny that we have the right to exclude rebels and traitors from the exercise of the elective franchise? And if we have the power to keep them from the ballot-box, may we not dictate the method by which they may return to it? Is there any reason why we may not, if we see fit, tell them that after five years, if they go through the process of naturalization, they may again vote? To my mind there can be no possible objection to that if we have the power to exclude them from the ballot-box at all.

Sir, I will vote for the bill as it is, if need be, although I would like to see it more thoroughly matured. I will vote for some other bill, if I have the chance, which comes up more nearly to what I desire. I will vote for some bill or other in order that there may be one step taken in the process of reconstruction.

The loyal people of the South cry out in earnest for us to do something for their relief. And they have cause to do so. The governments which have been given to the rebellious States by the President are all in the hands of men who are full of cruelty. They love cruelty, and indulge in it to-day as they have been indulging in it for months. And it is the voice of distress and suffering that comes up here to us asking for protection and relief; and it is the duty of the Thirty-Ninth Congress to do something in the process of reconstruction.

In regard to the amendment of the Constitution proposed by Congress at its last session, I looked upon it simply as a barrier over which no State could step after it should once have become a part of the Constitution. No one denied the power of Congress to prescribe just such terms as are to be found in that amendment; and the object of proposing it for ratification was that there might be imbedded in the Constitution the principles therein contained, so that no State legislation and no legislation of Congress should be able to override them. It was not to decide the question of our right to say to a State, "Thus far shalt thou go, and no farther;" that was not it. But it was to have imbedded in the Constitution certain great principles which could not be overridden by any State or by Congress.

One of the principles involved in that amendment was equality of representation. The southern people had formerly held four million slaves each five of whom were counted as three white people in their representation, though the slaves had no voice in the choice of the Representatives based upon their numbers. When those four million slaves came to be emancipated then representation became based upon the whole number instead of upon three fifths only as before. That provision of the amendment to the Constitution was for the purpose of preventing the Government of the United States from being overslaughed by the Representatives of a class who were to have no voice whatever in the election of those Representatives.

Now, what demands have any one of those ten States to make of this Government? What demand has even Nebraska to make? and she can make as many demands as North Carolina, South Carolina, or Georgia. What demands have either of them a right to make upon the Government? They have no legal State constitutions; they are not acknowledged by us to be States; they have had no Representatives in this Hall since the session of 1860-61; they are not held by Congress to occupy the position of States. If one of them desires to come into this Union as a State, is it not perfectly consistent for this Congress to do with South Carolina or Georgia what it has done in regard to Nebraska and Colorado? We have the right to say to them: the colored citizen born upon the soil must be allowed the right of suffrage; that this is one of the prerequisites to the admission of their Representatives upon this floor. Is there anything inconsistent in that? If so, then we have already been inconsistent in regard to Nebraska and Colorado. Then, if I am right in that, the amendment to the Constitution proposed to the States for ratification is not the final measure of reconstruction.

And, sir, we should not wait the action of the State Legislatures on the amendment proposed to them before we adopt legislation here to secure and protect, if possible, the loyal men in those States; and if there is to be a reorganization, one to be acknowledged by Congress, it should be a reorganization under the control of loyal men and none others.

Mr. Speaker, the opposition of the minority of this House has been consistent, steady, and unceasing to every proposition involving the interest and salvation of the Republic. James Buchanan, occupying the presidential chair when this rebellion commenced, said there was no right of secession under the Constitution of the United States, that no State had the right to secede, but that he had no authority under the Constitution to oppose or prevent it. Suppose, sir, that a man being murdered should use no means to oppose the violence inflicted upon him by the murderer except to say to his assailant, "You have no moral, no religious, no legal right to do what you are doing, but I have no right or authority to oppose you in your attack upon me." Mr. Speaker, would not this be an anomaly? Would anything in the affairs of men long exist with the tendency to so much mischief and evil manifest in all ages? Creation would be useless, as destruction would immediately follow.

Sir, there would be as much sense in such a proclamation by any man murderously assailed as there was in the announcement made by the President of this Republic when the southern States were taking their measures of secession. Sir, there is no Government that has not the power within it of self-preservation.

Mr. Speaker, the Opposition have been constantly proclaiming the same idea—weakness of the General Government, its inability to resist violence. The changes have constantly been rung upon the Constitution; every step we have taken has been declared to be in violation of the Constitution of the United States. It surprises me that with the Constitution so sadly broken and torn by the majority here the gentlemen composing the minority can find enough of it left to warrant their coming here and taking part in legislation.

This cry of invasion of the Constitution is the final resort in every argument. We are constantly told that we are unconstitutionally infringing upon the rights of the States, trying to blot out and obliterate State lines. Mr. Speaker, I am not forgetful of the fact that our Government is complex in form, that while we have a national Government we have State sovereignties within and under that Government. And I am not unmindful of another fact: that the States in their separate capacities and the nation as a whole are completely and admirably represented in the legislative branch of this Government. The Senators at the other end of this Capitol are the proper and legitimate representatives of the States, while the members of this House are the Representatives of the people at large. I am not unmindful of another fact: that the people in order to form a more perfect Union did ordain and establish the Constitution of the United States.

Sir, until I see some flagrant outrage committed by the Senate upon the rights of the States I shall feel it my duty to leave the guardianship of the States to them and confine myself to my legitimate business as a Representative of the people. I shall not, however, while so acting forget that there are States in this Union. When I hear so much said at this end of the Capitol about violating the Constitution and infringing the rights of the States, I think it is like the last resort of kings; they have no other argument, and they think this is very fine to dwell upon. Our Constitution, I think, has been well preserved, not only by loyal Representatives in this Hall, but by the loyal men who went to the field and fought our battles and crushed the rebellion.

Mr. Speaker, I have digressed somewhat from the bill before the House, but I think that the question upon which I have dwelt had reference more or less to it. I think that a proper self-respect on the part of Congress, as well as a regard to the welfare and safety of the nation, requires that before this session expires we shall adopt some measure which will enable the loyal men of the southern States to reorganize government and have some protection for themselves.

I had proposed to yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. SHELLABARGER,] but I see that he is not now present.

PAINTINGS FOR THE HALL.

Mr. BANKS, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read and referred to the Committee on the Library:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Library be authorized to contract with Albert Bierstadt for two paintings, thoroughly American in character, representing some prominent feature of the scenery or important event in the discovery or history of America, to fill two unoccupied panels of the Chamber of the House of Representatives.

RELIEF OF POOR IN THE DISTRICT—AGAIN.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to submit for adoption the joint resolution offered by me twice before providing for the relief of the poor in the District of Columbia.

Mr. RADFORD. I do not object provided the understanding is that it is to include the Mayor of Washington as well as General Howard, and is not to be amended.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I agree to that.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I object if the resolution is to be introduced with the understanding that it is not to be open to amendment.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the next time the gentleman introduces the joint resolution he will modify its language so as to say "in such sums and commodities."

Mr. INGERSOLL. I hope the gentleman from New York will withdraw his objection.

Mr. RADFORD. I understand what the design is, to get the joint resolution before the House and then to amend it as they please, and therefore I must object to the introduction of the resolution unless it be with the understanding that the name of the mayor of Washington shall not be stricken out.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. And I object to the resolution coming in with any understanding that it is not to be open to amendment.

HULL AND COZZENS, AND A. O. NAYLOR.

Mr. HOGAN, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Territories be requested to inquire what sum or sums of money are due to Hull & Cozzens, and A. O. Naylor, of St. Louis, Missouri, for work done and materials furnished for building the State House for Nebraska Territory, and to report by bill or otherwise.

And then, in compliance with the order of the House, (at a quarter to five o'clock p. m.) a recess was taken till half past seven o'clock p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House resumed its session at half past seven o'clock p. m., Mr. VAN HORN, of New York, acting as Speaker pro tempore.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. ASHLEY] is entitled to the floor, but as he is not present the Chair will assign the floor to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. TRIMBLE.]

TAX ON DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Mr. McKEE. My colleague [Mr. TRIMBLE] yields to me to ask leave to have printed as part of the proceedings some remarks I have prepared on the revenue law in relation to distilled spirits.

No objection was made, and leave was accordingly granted. [The remarks will appear in the Appendix.]

RECONSTRUCTION.

Mr. TRIMBLE addressed the House upon the subject of restoring to the States lately in insurrection their full political rights. [His remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. DODGE. Mr. Speaker, it was my purpose to have prepared some remarks to submit to the House in the morning, but I understand the debate is to close this evening, and I shall have no opportunity in the morning. I therefore embrace the present moment to give some reasons why it will be impossible for me to vote for the bill or the amendment. But I trust in the remarks I am about to make I shall not be accused of being a renegade to party; that I shall not be accused of going with those who are considered as enemies of the best interests of the country, for I claim to be as loyal as any other man.

Mr. RADFORD. To whom does the gentleman refer as enemies of the country? Does he mean gentlemen on this side of the House?

Mr. DODGE. Not at all; and I am glad to be interrupted to make the disclaimer.

I differ, Mr. Speaker, entirely with this side of the House in assuming as they do that the States lately in rebellion are out of the Union. I am not a constitutional lawyer, and not prepared to argue the question in a constitutional way. Looking at it in a common-sense way I think we have already recognized these States as States in the Union by submitting to them the constitutional amendment for the abolishment of slavery.

I assume, sir, it was impossible for them to have constitutionally ratified that amendment without being States in the Union. It was because they were States that it was submitted to them. At the last session we recognized, although they had in a certain sense lost their relations to the Government, that they were still States in the Union. In a discussion in this House in 1862 on the admission of West Virginia, this whole subject was very fully considered, and I quote from the remarks of Speaker COLFAX:

"Two things are required by the Constitution of the United States for the admission of this new State: first, the assent of the Legislature of the State out of which it is to be formed; and secondly, the assent of Congress. The decision then turns to a great extent upon the question whether the Governor now acting as the Governor of Virginia, and residing at Wheeling, and the Legislature to which he communicates his messages, are really the Governor and Legislature of the loyal people of Virginia. I think they are, and that the history of events in Virginia will prove that fact.

The next question is, has this loyal Legislature been recognized? There are facts enough in the action of the various branches of this Government to prove to us that they have, one and all, fully and in various ways recognized this as the only true and rightful government of Virginia. Allow me to present a few of them:

First, The Senate of the United States has recognized this Legislature as the Legislature of the State of Virginia, and admitted two Senators elected by that body to fill vacancies caused by treason as the rightfully chosen Senators of Virginia. That was done almost unanimously by that body.

I say, then, that not only the two legislative branches of the Government, but that the President of the United States and the various members of the Cabinet have, without dissent and without protest, as far as I have heard, by any one up to this day, recognized Governor Peirpoint and the Wheeling Legislature as the rightful authority in Virginia, and it therefore seems to be a settled and concluded question; and the consent of this Legislature to the division of the State is sufficient to bring it within the purview of the Constitution.

It appears to me that the State of Virginia was recognized then as a State, and the government under Governor Peirpoint was regarded as the constitutional government; competent to give its assent to the division of a portion of its territory and have it formed into a new State.

Then, again, we have treated them as States by sending to them the various amendments to the Constitution that passed this House at its last session. I am sure that a majority of the members of this House at least fully expected that these amendments would be sent to the Legislatures of the southern States for ratification. If they had seen fit to have ratified them—had it not been for the influences that were thrown around them in high quarters; had it not been for the Philadelphia convention and all the influences that emanated from that; had it not been the expectation on the part of the South that there would be another party in the country which would sustain the policy of the President; had they not been flattered and made to believe that if they refused to ratify the amendments they would yet be admitted to representation in Congress—I verily believe that a sufficient number of the southern States would have ratified the amendments to have made them, with the help of the northern States, a part of the organic law of the country.

I regret that these amendments could not have been ratified. I believe they were wisely designed to promote that peace and harmony which are necessary for the best interest of this entire country. They do not attempt to interfere with the constitutional rights of the States in regard to suffrage, but they do make a proper arrangement for the changed condition of things resulting from the emancipation of slaves and the destruction of slavery. They declare that if any portion of the people recently made free by the constitutional amendment and thus become citizens of the United States are deprived of the right of suffrage they shall not count in the basis of representation. We all know from the past history of the South that their desire has ever been to secure their full amount of political influence in the country, and that desire would have led them ere long to have passed such laws as would have eventually enfranchised the negro race. They have not seen fit to do it. These amendments were sent forth to the country as the result of six long months of careful deliberation on the part of the joint Committee on Reconstruction.

The loyal portion of the country—I beg pardon of my colleague, [Mr. RADFORD;] I will amend by saying the radical portion of the country, which, I presume, will satisfy him—the radical or Union portion of the people were almost universally satisfied with the report of the committee of fifteen, resulting in the passage of the joint resolution amending the Constitution. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that if these resolutions had been adopted, had been ratified by the States, and become a part of the organic law of the land, there would have been universal satisfaction throughout the country. When it was found that they were not likely, at present at least, to be adopted by the southern States, then the country looked anxiously to the deliberations of this House to what we would propose next. The country is anxiously looking at us now as the focal point from which is to emanate something that shall give peace, harmony, and prosperity to the country and perpetuity to the Government. And now, when the session is half over, we are about to present to the country the bill of the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania, or the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. ASHLEY.]

I have very carefully read these two bills or the bill and the proposed amendment, and I fail to find in either the original bill or in the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio anything that to my mind promises peace, union, and happiness as the result of its passage. I hold that it is of the very first importance that at the earliest possible day there should be a reconciliation—let me use that term—between the North and South; that there should be a permanent reconciliation; that as far as possible, considering the nature of man, we should forget and forgive the past so far as it is right and proper. And in passing laws here having that in view, we should be careful not to pass those that, from the very nature of man, must be calculated to irritate and perpetuate the very difficulties that now tend to separate us.

I hope, Mr. Speaker, that in the very desultory remarks I am making I shall not be understood as having no sympathy with the loyal men of the South who have been and still are suffering under the continued rule of the majority there, or as having no sympathy with the emancipated colored man, or as having no feeling for those who are being shot down, imprisoned, whipped, and deprived of their rights under the law. I feel as much sympathy for them as any gentleman on this floor. And yet I cannot divest myself of the feeling that to a certain extent just such a state of things was naturally to be expected from so sudden a change in the civil and social relations which have existed in the South for the last hundred years. It was hardly to be expected—it would have been a miracle if it had been so—that immediately upon this sudden and almost instantaneous severing of the relations which had existed between master and slave there should have been nothing to irritate; that there should have been no men of such unnatural feelings as would lead them to refuse to do justice to the emancipated negroes. We must all know that there are men North as well as South who are hard-hearted, unfeeling—men that seem to have no sense of right or justice.

But, sir, I do not say this as an apology for the wrongs done to the freedmen or for the cruel manner in which they have been and still are treated, in defiance of the civil rights bill, which we passed last year, and in despite of the provisions of the Freedmen's Bureau bill, which were all calculated to shield the freedman from the dangers which surround him. I make no apology for the wrongs done to them. I sympathize with the colored man as much as any gentleman upon this floor; but at the same time I cannot divest myself of the feeling that it was reasonable for us to expect for a certain length of time that there might be irritation and difficulty in administering the laws. What is wanted is something that will secure quiet and better feeling between the North and the South, and at the same time better feeling between southern men and the freedmen. And we want this because the southern country is part of our own. We fought for four long years that we might continue one undivided people, and if these southern States are still to be kept year after year in this state of disquietude we at the North, sympathizing with them in our social and business relations, must to a certain extent suffer with them. We want to devise some plan, equitable, just, and reasonable, that shall, if possible, bring about a state of peace, union, and harmony between the North and the South. I cannot see, Mr. Speaker, that either in the bill or the amendment there is anything calculated to bring about such a result. In the constitutional amendment we made a proper provision for the punishment, if I may use that expression, of the prominent men who were engaged in the rebellion. We disfranchised them for a certain length of time of the right to hold office under the Government.

The bill proposed here, with the amendment, provides that every man who was twenty-one years of age in 1861, and who has engaged in any way or held office under the so-called confederate government, or who has taken an oath to support that government—which, if I understand it, includes all the private soldiers in the confederate army—shall be disfranchised. They are to be deprived of all civil rights and to be placed in the position of aliens. They can only acquire the rights of citizenship as foreigners acquire them; by giving notice of their intention they become citizens in five years; by taking an oath, under the most fearful penalties, that from March, 1864, until the close of the war, they would have been ready, if opportunity had offered, to have done anything to have brought the war to a close; that they had no sympathy with the war after that time, and that they would, if opportunity had presented itself, have accepted the amnesty offered by President Lincoln and left the confederate government. How large a proportion of the southern people could come forward and honestly take that oath? The result of the passage of this bill, if it shall become operative, will be to disfranchise nearly the entire white population of the southern States, and at the same time enfranchise the colored people and give them the virtual control in the proposed organization of the new State governments.

I submit as a dictate of common sense, taking mankind as we find them, as we know they are, is it natural to suppose that the passage of such a law as this will be calculated to promote increased friendly relations between the North and South, to create a better feeling between the white and the colored population? I assume that that should be the object of the laws which we pass, as well as to protect in all their civil rights the loyal white man and the freedman. I can see nothing either in the original bill or in the proposed substitute which is calculated to increase or create any good feeling between the North and South. It is not natural that they should love us while we are putting them under such a ban. Under this bill, if they shall ever be formed into States, all the men who have ever held office under the confederate government are to be entirely disfranchised.

Mr. Speaker, if we had gone before our State at the last election and had proposed as a plan for reconstruction and settling the difficulties existing between the North and South the plan contained in this bill and the amendment, I have no hesitation in saying we would have lost the State of New York. I do not know what was the course pursued in other States, but when we went into the canvass in the State of New York we took our stand upon the amendment to the Constitution and assumed that we intended to hold the South where they were until they should see fit to ratify that amendment.

Mr. RADFORD. Will my colleague allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. DODGE. Certainly.

Mr. RADFORD. I desire to know if the gentleman is now in favor of admitting the southern States to a representation here in Congress provided they ratify the amendment to the Constitution?

Mr. DODGE. I say unhesitatingly that I should, provided they send loyal men here.

Mr. RADFORD. That is my religion.

Mr. DODGE. I believe if this Congress shall abandon the idea of requiring the ratification of the constitutional amendment passed by the last session of Congress, and shall pass these bills and they become laws, the people of the country will not be satisfied. As they examine them they will see provision made for the military support of the new State organizations contemplated. They will see that by the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SPALDING] in all these ten States martial law is to be declared, and we are to go, if not into actual war again with the South, at least to put the South under martial rule; that the writ of habeas corpus is to be suspended, that writ so precious to us all as citizens. They will see that this is not likely in the nature of things to bring about an early reorganization of the South. The commercial, the manufacturing, and the agricultural interests of this country, as they look at this matter, will see in it a continuance of taxation necessary to support this military array sent to these ten States.

Then, in connection with this, they will see the attempt which is now being made in this House to impeach the President. I speak of the impeachment, not because I would not be as ready as any man in the House to impeach the President if there can be specific charges brought against him which will enable the Senate of the United States to find a true bill against him. But looking at it in view of the present position of the party to which I belong, I think it a most unfortunate move. I hold that the President of the United States has been impeached by the country; that he stands impeached to-day; and that this effort will simply tend to galvanize him again into life, to give him an amount of sympathy which he never would get otherwise. I think it a most unfortunate move in a party point of view; but of vastly more importance in its relations to the great interests of the country, which are being paralyzed in view of this unprecedented movement.

Sir, if this bill should pass, and if we go on with the impeachment movement and carry it to the Senate, you will find that all the great interests of this country will measurably stand still, waiting the result of these movements. The manufacturing, commercial, and agricultural interests of the country are now looking to this House for that support which may be given by an increased tariff, but they will look in vain for a resuscitation of business and a return to a healthy state of things so long as the public mind shall be agitated by this unexpected and unusual measure brought forward in this House. There are gentlemen from all parts of the country who are making their way to our great commercial centers, to obtain the means for carrying on the enterprises so necessary to the development of our country. But when they go to the capitalists asking means or offering for sale their railroad bonds, when they present propositions for their varied enterprises, they will find that the men who control the money are waiting to see what shall be the result upon the interests of the country of the measures about to be acted upon in this House. Mr. Speaker, the fact is there will be a general hesitation. The man who has been contemplating the building of a ship will stand still and await the development of these measures. The merchant, about to send his vessel on a long eastern voyage, will hesitate before he loads his ship and sends her away on a twelve months' voyage.

Sir, I received to-day, from one of our merchants, a letter stating that on Friday last he met with some gentlemen who are directors of a benevolent institution of which he is the treasurer, those gentlemen being among the wealthiest and most loyal men of our country; and at that meeting they decided that $150,000, placed in his hands for investment, and which they had at a previous meeting resolved to invest in United States securities, should be deposited in the Life and Trust Company, to await the action of this House on these important measures now pending.

Sir, you will find that the man who has been waiting the decline of materials to build will wait still longer. The result will be a partial paralysis of the great interests of the whole country, and especially if this bill shall pass, and if the other measure to which I have referred shall be pressed to a decision.

Mr. Speaker, we have been living for six long years between hope and fear. I assure you, sir, that standing here to-day, looking at these measures, fraught, as I believe, with so much danger to the best interests of the country, I feel very much as I did when I stood in the peace conference before the war and saw the dark clouds that were gathering over our country. I feel that we are now in great peril, and ought not to look simply to the immediate enfranchisement of the negro race, overlooking all the other great interests of the country which are dependent upon the legislation we may adopt. No man on this floor is more strongly in favor than I am of protecting the best interests of the colored man. I voted with all my heart for their enfranchisement in this District; and I would go as far as any other man to elevate and advance the colored race, downtrodden as they have been so long. But pass this bill, and I cannot see that it will be productive of aught else than injury to the colored race. We need to-day measures which shall elevate their condition, which shall render them most valuable as citizens. We want to place them in such a position that their labor will be sought after as a matter of interest, and that they may receive from the people with whom they have so long associated that treatment to which they are entitled. But the very fact that the white population of the South by this bill are to be almost universally degraded while the colored men are elevated above them is not, in my opinion, calculated at all to promote the best interests of either.

I do hope, Mr. Speaker, that neither the bill of the gentleman from Pennsylvania nor the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio will pass. I trust that some other plan will be devised by which the loyal men in the South and the freedmen shall be protected in their civil rights. I hope that we shall not attempt to reorganize the southern States by assuming they are nothing but Territories and their inhabitants aliens.

Mr. Speaker, I trust these bills will be referred to the Committee on Reconstruction, with the hope that they may be able to present to the House some constitutional plan by which the loyal men of the South, white and black, may be protected in all their rights of person and property, and which may put an effectual stop to the injustice, persecution, and murders which are now going on in all parts of the South apparently without restraint from the general or local governments.

Mr. HISE next addressed the House upon the same subject. [His remarks will be found in the Appendix.]

Mr. PERHAM moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to, and accordingly (at ten o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions, &c., were presented under the rule, and referred to the appropriate committees:

By the SPEAKER: The petition of Daniel P. Monroe, and 32 others, citizens of Dawson county, Georgia, asking that in the work of reconstruction the elective franchise in the rebel States shall be placed in the hands of loyal people only.

Also, the petition of the Michigan City Harbor Company, asking that the appropriation made in the harbor and river appropriation bill of the last session to aid them in the construction of works and the improvement of the harbor at Michigan City, Indiana, may be placed at their disposal when the company shall have expended $100,000 of their own funds thereon.

Also, the petition of J. W. McMinn, and 5,000 others, citizens of western North Carolina, asking the formation of a new State in that region, or the reconstruction of North Carolina on a loyal basis.

Also, the petition of S. Beatty, H. Garner, A. W. Porter, J. S. Bender, J. B. Hoag, J. H. Adair, and others, citizens of Knox, Indiana, praying that there may be no curtailment or withdrawal of the national currency.

By Mr. BEAMAN: The petition of Robert Inksee, and 35 others, citizens of Wayne county, Michigan, praying for the impeachment of the President of the United States.

By Mr. BROOMALL: The petition of citizens of the United States residing within the limits of the former State of Georgia, praying Congress to abolish the existing organization in that State, and to enable the loyal citizens, without regard to race or color, to form a State government.

Also, the petition of citizens of Delaware county, in that State, remonstrating against the passage of any law for the more rapid curtailment of the currency, and against requiring the national banks to redeem their issues in New York.

By Mr. BUCKLAND: The petition of T. D. West, for relief for damages done to buildings, &c., by United States troops.

By Mr. BUNDY: The petition of Thomas B. Davis, and 30 others, citizens of Vinton county, Ohio, against the further curtailment of the national currency.

By Mr. BUBLEIGH: A memorial of the Legislative Assembly of Dakota Territory, praying for a geological survey of the Black Hill country.

By Mr. DAWES: The petition of George W. Paschal.

By Mr. DRIGGS: The petition of Captain E. B. Ward, Moore, Foote & Co., and 20 others, merchants and ship-owners of Detroit, Michigan, praying Congress to make an appropriation for light-house and piers for the improvement of the harbor at Alpena, Thunder Bay, on Lake Huron, Michigan.

By Mr. EGGLESTON: The petition of R. W. Booth & Co., and 7 other mercantile firms of Ohio, protesting against an advance of duty on steel.

By Mr. ELIOT: The petition of William F. Golden, and others, of Georgia, for legislative aid for freed men.

By Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky: The petition of citizens of Nelson county, Kentucky, against a return to specie payment.

Also, the petition of J. Harding Magruder, of Shelby county, Kentucky, praying for compensation for slaves.

By Mr. HOLMES: The petition of George A. Crolius, for American register for the schooner Mayflower of Port Dover.

Also, the petition of James McLaughlin and Timothy Driscoll, for American register for schooner Gem.

By Mr. KELLEY: The petition of 80 loyal (colored) citizens of North Carolina, praying Congress to pass into a law the bill introduced by Hon. THADDEUS STEVENS December 19, 1866, to establish civil government in North Carolina, or to pass some bill similar in character, so that civil government may be speedily established on a thoroughly loyal basis in North Carolina.

Also, the petition of 56 manufacturers and journeymen cigar-makers, citizens of the fourth congressional district of Pennsylvania, praying Congress to so amend the internal revenue tax on cigars as to create a specific tax of five dollars per thousand on all domestic cigars, thereby affording a more adequate protection to the honest manufacturers and journeymen and a larger revenue to the Government than by any other possible means, &c.

By Mr. KOONTZ: The petition of William H. Hafer, of company E, second regiment Pennsylvania cavalry, for pension.

By Mr. MARSTON: The petition of Charlotte A. Thomas, Stephen Fessenden, and 44 others, residents of Windham, New Hampshire, asking that the tariff on wool and woolsens passed by the House of Representatives at its last session may become a law.

By Mr. MARVIN: The petition of Daniel A. Atwell, E. Ross, C. M. Underhill, and others, citizens of Schenectady, New York, praying for the establishment of a uniform system of inter-State insurance.

By Mr. PRICE: The petition of 32 citizens of Jones county, Iowa, asking for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States guaranteeing equality for all citizens before the law, regardless of birth, race, or color.

By Mr. SCHENCK: The memorial of Lieutenant Robert E. Riehl, United States Navy, for the passage of an act of special legislation that may give him the promotion to which he claims he is entitled and which he alleges has been unjustly withheld.

By Mr. SPALDING: The petition of Mary B. Fowler, of Cleveland, Ohio, for pension.

By Mr. UPSON: The petition of Otis Shepardson, Z. H. Wallace, and 82 others, of St. Joseph county, Michigan, praying for the impeachment of Andrew Johnson, acting President of the United States, for high crimes and misdemeanors.

By Mr. WARD, of New York: The petition of 34 citizens of Alleghany county, New York, in favor of the impeachment of the President.

By Mr. WARNER: The petition of George W. Howland, of New Haven, Connecticut, for compensation for services while held to military service.

Also, the memorial of the Union Knife Company, Tuttle & Whittemore, and others, hardware manufacturers and workmen of Naugatuck, Connecticut, praying for a reduction of the internal revenue tax on their several products of manufacture.

Also, the memorial of William Wilcox & Co., and employees, manufacturers of padlocks and other articles of hardware, praying for reduction of internal revenue tax on these products.

Also, the memorial of Union Shear Company, and others, manufacturers and employees, praying for a reduction of internal revenue tax on manufactures.

By Mr. WASHBURN, of Massachusetts: The petition of Fuller & Tucker, and others, citizens of Hampshire county, in Massachusetts, asking that the tax on cigars be changed to a specific tax of not over five dollars per thousand.

By Mr. WILSON, of Pennsylvania: The petition of 400 naturalized citizens and immigrants who have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, residing in Clinton county, Pennsylvania, asking Congress to so amend the negro suffrage act for the District of Columbia as to put white men who are citizens or who have declared their intention of becoming citizens and residents of the District upon an equal footing with the negroes, and to extend to them the same privileges enjoyed by negroes.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, January 22, 1867.

Prayer by Rev. C. R. HAINS, of West River, Maryland.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented the credentials of Hon. Charles D. Drake, elected a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Missouri for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th of March, 1867; which were ordered to be placed on the files of the Senate.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of War, communicating, in obedience to law, a statement of the expenditures and of the arms, &c., manufactured and repaired at the Springfield Armory during the year ending June 30, 1866; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia, and ordered to be printed.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. WILLEY. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to make a remark or two in regard to a matter in the nature of a matter of privilege. It will be within the recollection of the Senate that a few days since I had occasion to advert to certain extracts from the Wheeling Register, at that time edited by a Mr. Long, now postmaster of the city of Wheeling. I have received a letter from Mr. Long, in which he complains somewhat that injustice has been done him by reading those extracts; and I will read his own explanation, so that it may go out to the country together with the extracts:

"Of the alleged extracts from the Register but one appeared as original matter, the others, if they were published at all, having been copied from other journals. In addition to this fact, it can be proven that I was not personally responsible for the publication of any of these things. I was absent from the city and from the State when it is alleged that the extracts were published in the Register. I had nothing to do with them whatever, and should not be made to suffer for them."

It is proper I should state that the attention of Mr. Long was directed to these extracts so long ago as the 30th of August last by a very sharp criticism in another paper published in that city; but I am not aware that Mr. Long or any other person for him disavowed his complicity with those articles, or in any way denounced the spirit and matter of them until now. It was to be presumed, therefore, that he was responsible for them. My remarks and the extracts have gone out to the country, and I have placed his own explanation upon the records of the Senate, to go out along with them, and if any injustice has been done him his own explanation of the matter will go out to the country also.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana, in favor of an amendment to the organic act of the Territory so as to extend the jurisdiction of justices of the peace; which was referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

He also presented a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of Montana, in favor of the establishment of certain post routes and post offices in that Territory; which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON presented a petition of officers of the United States Army, praying that when officers are withdrawn from active service and placed on the retired list under existing laws they may be allowed to retain their service or longevity rations; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

He also presented three petitions of officers in the United States Army, praying for an increase of pay; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. MORGAN presented two petitions of citizens of New York, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, now pending in the Senate; which were ordered to lie upon the table.

Mr. CONNESS. I present a memorial of the Legislative Assembly of the Territory of New Mexico, concerning an attempt said to have been made there to obtain a grant of land by certain military officers, among whom are Brigadier General James H. Carleton, Brevet Colonel N. H. Davis, Brevet Lieutenant Colonel A. B. Carey, and others. I believe a similar memorial has already been presented and referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims. I ask that this may have the same reference.

It was so referred.

Mr. CHANDLER presented a petition of citizens of Michigan, praying for the passage of House bill No. 718, to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes, so far as it relates to foreign wool; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

He also presented a resolution of the Bellevue Farmers' Club, of Eaton county, Michigan, praying for an increase of the duty on foreign wool; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I present a memorial of citizens of the Territory of Idaho and citizens of New York interested in the mining and agricultural interests of that Territory, in which they represent that the business of the Territory amounts annually to millions of dollars; that they have no medium of exchange there except gold dust, which, by reason of a difference of fineness and adulteration, has no uniform value and is exceedingly hazardous. They further represent that they are remote from the principal centers of business; that communication with the principal cities of the country is exceedingly difficult; and they are anxious to have some legislation by which that Territory can be provided with some of the national currency of the country. As it is a subject which relates to the finances, I move that this memorial be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRIMES. I present the memorial of Charles W. Buck, late an acting master of the United States Navy, who represents that while serving in that capacity on board the United States gunboat Water Witch, in Ossibaw sound, on the southern coast, the vessel (not through his fault, but through the negligence of the watch officer) was captured, and the Navy Department have decided that he is entitled to no relief for losses sustained thereby; and he appeals to Congress for aid. I ask its reference to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

It was so referred.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of journeymen cigar-makers and manufacturers of cigars, of Toledo, Ohio, praying for a specific tax of five dollars per thousand on all domestic cigars, that the present tariff on imported cigars may remain unchanged, and that the present system of stamping be altered so as to allow the sale of stamps to manufacturers at five dollars per thousand, and that the penalty for violating the revenue laws be increased; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. PATTERSON presented a memorial of the Chamber of Commerce of Memphis, Tennessee, praying that the Union Pacific Railway (southern branch) Company be as liberally endowed with subsidies and franchises as the Union Pacific railroad and its northern branches; which was referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad.

He also presented a petition of Captain Daniel Ellis, praying for compensation for services rendered in recruiting for the Union Army in East Tennessee during the rebellion, together with statements by Colonel John K. Miller, of the thirteenth Tennessee cavalry, Colonel George W. Kirk, third North Carolina infantry, and Lieutenant F. S. Singletory, of the fourth regiment Tennessee infantry, in support of the petition; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. JOHNSON presented a memorial of citizens of Little Rock, Arkansas, representing that in May, 1865, a large amount of property in that city was sold for the non-payment of the United States direct tax, and remonstrating against the passage of any law to remedy the defects in the sale; which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CRESWELL. I present a memorial of merchants, mechanics, and manufacturers of Baltimore, constituting a large proportion of the industrial capital of that city, remonstrating against the passage of the bankrupt bill; and in support of their remonstrance they make the following points:

"1. They suggest that there is no present necessity in the financial condition of the country for measures of relief.

"2. They claim that since the abolition of imprisonment for debt in the States, no question of humanity to honest, unfortunate debtors is involved, and they respectfully represent that experience has demonstrated the ease with which debtors can compound with their creditors on a reasonable exposition of their affairs.

"3. They call your attention to the fact that immense sums are due from persons in the States lately in rebellion, who would be enabled to avail themselves of such legal obstacles to the collection of debts; and your memorialists are satisfied from experience that many debtors would take advantage of any law of that kind to defraud their creditors of their just dues, which otherwise could be collected by the ordinary process.

"4. And chiefly, they protest against the injustice of any retrospective enactment, taking from the creditor those securities of statute law under which the credit was given and the obligation incurred. They are forced by observation and experience to believe that such legislation is demoralizing in its tendency, and violative of good faith toward the important class of interests upon which it would most severely bear."

As the Committee on the Judiciary, who had the bankrupt bill in charge, reported it some time ago, I ask that this memorial be printed and laid on the table.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to print will go to the Committee on Printing, and the order to lie upon the table will be entered.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. HENDERSON, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of George and W. H. Wood, presented to the Senate on the 26th of January, 1864, and referred to the Committee on Claims, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate and again referred to said committee.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. GRIMES, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 681) for the relief of Celestia P. Hart, reported it without amendment.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 68) in relation to the office of naval judge advocate general and of solicitor of the Navy Department, reported adversely thereon, and moved the indefinite postponement of the bill; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 233) in relation to the appointment of enlisted persons in the Naval Academy, and for other purposes, reported adversely thereon, and moved the indefinite postponement of the bill; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 346) to amend section seven of the naval appropriation bill, approved March 3, 1845, reported adversely thereon, and moved the indefinite postponement of the bill; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a memorial of petty officers, seamen, and others on board of vessels in the employ of the Government, praying for an amendment to the act for the relief of seamen and others borne on the books of vessels wrecked or lost in the naval service, approved July 4, 1864, so as to include those on board of vessels in the employ of the Government captured by the enemy, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a memorial of the St. Domingo Mining and Commercial Company, praying that immediate steps be taken to explore and ascertain some commercial place on the island of St. Domingo with reference to its adaptability as a naval station, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of Michigan, in favor of the location and establishment of a naval station and dock-yard at Grand Haven, in that State, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the Chamber of Commerce of the State of New York in favor of the passage of Senate bill No. 233, in relation to the appointment of enlisted persons in the Naval Academy, and for other purposes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. HENDERSON, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 126) for the relief of certain settlers on the Sioux reservation, in the State of Minnesota, reported it without amendment.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. CHANDLER asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 521) to amend an act entitled "An act for the disposal of coal lands and of town property in the public domain," approved July 1, 1864, and to amend an act supplemental thereto, approved March 3, 1865; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WILSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 522) to equalize the bounties of soldiers, sailors, and marines who served in the late war for the Union; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

Mr. WILLIAMS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 523) to provide for the registration of electors in the Territories of the United States; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Territories, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POLAND asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 524) establishing the salaries of the judges in the Territories; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PATTERSON asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. No. 158) for the relief of Daniel Ellis; which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs and the Militia.

DIGEST OF REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask the Senate to grant an order for the printing of a digest of the statutes of the United States prescribing the rates of duties on imports in force October 1, 1866, with an index prepared by Mr. Lewis Heyl, of the Treasury Department. As the subject is now before us, I desire to have this digest printed, so that we may have it on our tables.

The motion was agreed to.

CONSTRUCTION OF LAND-GRANT BILLS.

Mr. NORTON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Whereas it is alleged that by the construction of the Department of the Interior of several acts of Congress granting lands to aid in the construction of certain railroads settlers are deprived of the full benefit of the preemption and homestead laws: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be, and is hereby, directed to inquire what, if any, legislation is necessary or may be had to correct such construction, and to report by bill or otherwise.

PENSION AGENTS.

Mr. LANE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No.

69, to provide for the payment of pensions, which stands upon a motion to reconsider.

Mr. HENDRICKS. As a bill has passed the Senate regulating the appointment and tenure of all officers whose appointment requires the confirmation of the Senate, I cannot see any necessity for this bill; at least the latter part of it. All that it is necessary now for the Senate to do, it seems to me, is to provide for the appointment of these agents by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and then they will fall under the bill that was passed last week. If Senators think that bill was right in regard to all presidential appointments, these being presidential appointments of course ought to be governed by its provisions; and therefore I think the reconsideration ought to take place.

Mr. LANE. After full consideration at the last session and the present session we have matured and passed a bill for the appointment of pension agents, which now stands merely upon a motion to reconsider. It was passed by a very large vote of the Senate, and a motion to reconsider was made. It does not fall within the scope of the bill passed on the subject of appointments to office generally, because the provision embraced in this bill is not touched by the provisions of that bill. It is true that this bill makes the nomination of the President and confirmation of the Senate necessary to the appointment of pension agents. It is equally true that by another provision reported by the Judiciary Committee this bill proposes that the offices of certain pension agents, those appointed since July last, shall expire within thirty days after the passage of the bill. This bill, then, contemplates a class of officers not embraced and not touched in the general bill passed the other day. As the whole subject of the bill has been under debate several times in the Senate, I shall content myself now with expressing the hope that the Senate will not reconsider, but will let this matter be passed.

Mr. HENDRICKS. I do not wish to continue the debate with my colleague on this subject; but I think his first suggestion is calculated to make a wrong impression on the Senate. He said that this bill was considered at the last session and passed. At the last session he reported a bill making these agents to be appointed by the President, and not any longer by the Secretary of the Interior. That was the bill that my colleague proposed—a bill that I was very well satisfied to approve; but he never did report, and I do not think he would report, a bill that certain officers appointed before the 1st day of October shall not go out of office, and all appointed under the same law after that date shall go out. He did not report any such provision; it was not in the bill; the Senate did not vote it at the last session; it was not up; but now, when these appointments are made subject to the confirmation of the Senate, this entire class of officers will fall under the operations of the bill that the Senate passed last week. If that bill is right, it ought to govern these officers; if it is wrong, it ought not to govern any officers. That is a plain proposition. It is the bill that the majority agreed to in regard to presidential appointments. If it is right, the majority ought to make it applicable to all officers; if it is wrong, they ought to repeal it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion that the Senate now proceed to the consideration of Senate bill No. 69, to provide for the payment of pensions.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate. The question is, Will the Senate reconsider its vote passing the bill?

Mr. BUCKALEW. I understood the question was on reconsidering the concurrence of the Senate in the House amendment. The bill passed the Senate at the last session and came back at the present session from the House with this amendment in relation to the dismissal of agents at the expiration of thirty days; and, if I am correct in my recollection, the pending question is upon reconsidering the vote by which the Senate concurred in the House amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Pennsylvania is right technically; but that vote passed the bill, and the Chair therefore stated it in the general form. Technically, the question is, will the Senate reconsider its vote concurring in the amendment made by the House to the bill, the effect of concurring being to pass the bill. The question is on the reconsideration.

Mr. BUCKALEW. Then I hope the Senate will reconsider its vote in order to free the bill from this novel feature, and, as already explained by the Senator from Indiana, allow these officers to fall under the general regulations, which are, or may be, provided by law, instead of singling them out, a very few in number, and introducing a very objectionable feature in our legislation, to wit, the direct dismissal of officers by the act of Congress itself, the legislative body, instead of leaving their dismissal either to the former regulations of law or to the new principle which has been introduced, namely, the conjoint action of the Senate and the President.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask for the yeas and nays on the reconsideration.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I trust that the action of the Senate on this bill will not be reconsidered. I think it is right. I was not present at the time that action was had in the Senate; but the bill was considered in the Committee on the Judiciary, and I see, on looking at it, that the Senate has substantially concurred in the report of the committee. I think the report is correct. I see nothing to be gained by a reconsideration. Here is a class of officers, formerly of very little importance in the country, but since the war of very great importance. The Secretary of the Interior, under, as I think, rather a forced consideration of the law, has undertaken to appoint pension agents ad libitum, dividing up the States and appointing as many as he pleased, and paying them salaries in the way of a percentage, which makes the offices very important. They handle a great deal of money. Here is a bill providing that hereafter these officers shall be nominated by the President and appointed by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. I suppose no one has any objection to that.

Another provision of the bill is that all these officers who have been appointed within the last few months—I think since the 1st of October, 1866, if I recollect the bill correctly—shall go out of office within thirty days. Is there anything wrong in that? Is there anything unusual in that? By no means. It is in conformity to the legislation of Congress forty-seven years ago. In 1820 the Congress of the United States passed a law providing that persons in office should go out at different periods: that those appointed after a certain date should go out at one time, and those appointed after another date at another time. I can see no objection to this provision. I was not present when the discussion took place upon it; but it is in harmony with the previous legislation of Congress, and I can see no objection to declaring that these officers who have been recently appointed should go out of office within a certain time, and that the others should go out of office at a different period. Precisely such legislation as that has been had heretofore. I trust that the Senate will not reconsider its vote, but will let the bill stand as it is.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There was no sort of objection in the mind of any one to the first provision of the bill, which was all very proper as it passed the Senate originally, and that was providing that these officers hereafter shall be nominated by the President and confirmed by the Senate, and providing also for limiting the number. But the bill goes further by the amendment of the House, and provides that a certain portion of those who have been appointed—not all of them, but a certain portion who have been appointed recently—shall go out of office. That is the way it stands as I understand it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. All who have been appointed within a certain period.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why not apply it to all who have been appointed?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I can give the reason.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The reason is very obvious. The Senator need not give it. Those appointed before that as pension agents were appointed by our side. Since the present Secretary of the Interior has come in he has turned out a few and appointed some others; and the bill provides, or is intended to provide, that those whom the present Secretary has appointed since he came into office shall go out. That is about the amount of it. If the Senator wants to conform his action to all the previous legislation of Congress let him put them all out.

I have no objection to the proposition except simply what I stated a day or two ago; it is a kind of legislation that I do not like. Authority has been exerted legally on the subject, and I do not think it will look well for the credit of Congress if we direct our legislation merely to putting out a few officers who have been appointed in different parts of the country—I believe there are but few of them—by the present Secretary of the Interior. That is my only objection to it, and it is the reason why I objected the other day. If the Senate choose to do it, they can do so; but I really do not think that the great duty of the hour of the great party to which I have the honor to belong is to devote itself to keeping certain persons in office and preventing other persons from getting in. I think they have duties beyond and larger than that.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not think either that that is the great business of the country, to keep certain men in office and certain others out; but I think it is very proper that the Congress of the United States, so far as it has the power, should see that the friends of the country exercise the official authority of the country. These persons have been appointed, to say the least of it, under questionable authority. I have looked into the law as carefully as I was capable of examining it, and I have never been satisfied that the Secretary of the Interior had the authority to make these appointments.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The present Secretary had just as much as the previous Secretary.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Yes, sir; but this is a novel thing that has been done very recently by all of them since the war. I made some remarks in the Senate before the present Secretary occupied the position of Secretary of the Interior in which I contested the authority of the Secretary to make these appointments.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Nobody objects to that part of the bill at all.

Mr. JOHNSON. They ought all to go out.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; they ought not all to go out because the law had specifically provided for certain pension agents. Congress many years ago established pension agents when this branch of the public service was connected with the War Department, and by special acts of Congress pension agencies were established in the different States, at Tuscaloosa, Alabama, and at other points; but when this branch of the public service was transferred from the War to the Interior Department, the Secretary of the Interior assumes, possibly correctly by inference from some laws which have been passed—there is no direct statute authorizing it—that he had this authority. I think it is questionable whether he had it or not. This is not novel legislation. I will say to the Senator from Maine that similar legislation to this was had in 1820 when the terms of various officers were fixed; some went out of office at the end of one year, and some at the end of two. This bill does not prevent the President from removing any of these officers, but it declares that certain of them shall go out within a limited period; and so did the act of 1820.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That turned them all out at some period or other.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think it did provide that all of them should go out within some period. It seems, then, that if this bill had provided that no one should hold the office for more than four years without a reappointment, as the act of 1820 provided in regard to marshals, a certain class of postmasters, district attorneys, registers of land offices, and other officers, it would obviate the objection which the Senator from Maine has. Perhaps it would be well enough to limit it. I am not sure whether the bill under consideration does limit the term of service to four years or to any definite period. It might be well enough to do it. But whether limited or not, the President exercises the power of nominating at any time a person as a new incumbent of any of these offices, and if the Senate confirms the nominee the old officer goes out even within the four years. It is a very common thing for a postmaster to be removed who has served but one or two years, although the term of office which he would serve would be four years if he was not interfered with by the Executive.

Mr. LANE. If the Senator will pardon me one moment, I can inform him that the bill provides expressly for a term of four years.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Very well; then it meets that objection. They all go out within a limited period, and it is in that respect in precise conformity to the legislation of 1820. The only effect of the bill is, that it provides that certain officers shall go out sooner than others. There is nothing novel in that legislation; and it seems to me, in the condition of the country, it is very proper that such legislation should be had. I certainly am desirous that legislation should be had that will put a termination to the offices of certain persons who have been appointed within the last few months, in some of the States at least.

Mr. CONNESS. I am opposed to this reconsideration, and I confess very freely that my opposition is based in a great measure upon the fact that the appointments complained of were made by the present Secretary of the Interior, because I regard him as one of the most responsible of the bad advisers of the President, and one of the most accountable for the unfortunate differences that have occurred between the executive and legislative departments of the Government. These do not furnish the only cases in which that officer has exhibited that class of partisanship that is based upon the removal of men from office because they have not taken up the cudgels in behalf of the Executive, or rather against Congress. In place of using his time and bringing his talent to an adjustment of the differences that existed, I have the best reason to believe that that officer has constantly promoted the unfortunate difficulties to which I have referred, from which the country suffers so much. Therefore, sir, I am opposed to the reconsideration and in favor of just such legislation as has been enacted.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I wish to state a simple proposition, which is clear to my own mind, and yet I may be in error. It is a question of law. These pension agents were appointed by authority of law by the Secretary of the Interior. They entered upon the discharge of the duties of their office. According to judicial decision, they had a property in their office; and the proposition now is, not to repeal the act creating the offices, but to remove, by legislative power, men in office having a property in their office. I hold that that is not within the competency of Congress; but if they wish to get clear of these officers they must repeal the act under which they were appointed; and Congress has so acted. When it seemed necessary for the good of the country, and in obedience to the dictates of "loyalty," that Congress should get clear of the courts in this District, what did they do? Did they attempt by a single act of legislation to remove the judges? No, sir; but they repealed the act constituting the court. Now, sir, I hold that these officers having been appointed according to law by a power having the right to appoint them it is not competent for the legislative department of the Government simply to remove them; but if they wish to get clear of them they must repeal the act under which they were appointed, and pass another act, under which other persons may be appointed in their stead. For that reason I shall vote for the reconsideration.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I stated that this legislation was not without precedent. The Senator from Maine seemed to think it was a novel mode of legislating. I have now before me the act of May 15, 1820, which declares—

"That from and after the passing of this act all district attorneys, collectors of the customs, naval officers and surveyors of the customs, navy agents, receivers of public moneys for lands, registers of the land offices"—

Enumerating various officers—

"to be appointed under the laws of the United States, shall be appointed for the term of four years, but shall be removable from office at pleasure."

The second section reads as follows:

"That the commission of each and every of the officers named in the first section of this act, now in office, unless vacated by removal from office or otherwise, shall cease and expire in the manner following: all such commissions bearing date on or before the 30th day of September, 1814, shall cease and expire on the day and month of their respective dates which shall next ensue after the 30th day of September next; all such commissions bearing date after the said 30th day of September, in the year 1814, and before the 1st day of October, 1816, shall cease and expire on the day and month of their respective dates which shall next ensue after the 30th day of September, 1821; and all other such commissions shall cease and expire at the expiration of the term of four years from their respective dates."

Now, the Senate will observe that if a person was appointed a register of a land office or a district attorney after the 1st day of October, 1816, say on the 1st day of November, 1816, he would go out at the end of four years, which would be the 1st of November, 1820; whereas a person appointed before October, 1816, would hold until the 30th of September, 1821.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is the other way I think.

Mr. TRUMBULL. No, sir; those last appointed would go out before those who had been appointed prior to October, 1816. Those appointed prior to October, 1816, and after 1814, were to hold until the 30th of September, 1821, but all others—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Were to hold for four years.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Well, if they were appointed in November, 1816, the four years would expire in November, 1820, which would be a year before the others would go out; and the different periods were fixed when the various officers would go out of office. I think the case is entirely analogous to the one we have before us. It is no new legislation—nothing extraordinary to declare that certain persons in office shall go out of office. Some time certainly should be fixed when these persons appointed by the Secretary of the Interior should go out of office.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will simply say that the Senator is mistaken. Those earliest appointed by the act of May 15, 1820, go out of office first.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator will read it through he will see that he is mistaken.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will read it: "All such commissions bearing date on or before the 30th day of September, 1814"—

That is the earliest date.

"shall cease and expire on the day and month of their respective dates, which shall next ensue after the 30th day of September next."

That is 1820.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is right. That is the first time.

Mr. FESSENDEN.

"All such commissions bearing date after the said 30th day of September, in the year 1814, and before the 1st day of October, 1816, shall cease and expire on the day and month of their respective dates, which shall next ensue after the 30th day of September, 1821."

That is a later year.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Now, read the rest.

Mr. FESSENDEN.

"And all other such commissions shall cease and expire at the expiration of the term of four years from their respective dates."

Mr. TRUMBULL. Let me ask the Senator, suppose a person was appointed on the 1st of November, 1866, when would he go out of office?

Mr. FESSENDEN. But the obvious intent of the law is to make those first appointed go out first.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It is as to part of them; but the Senator will see it is not the case as to those appointed after October, 1816.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It goes up to 1820. There might possibly be a few, but the most of them would hold over for a still longer period.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Some of them, but the principle is in the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The principle is that those first appointed should first go out of office clearly, because otherwise why did they postpone the second class after the first class; and even there the great majority of them would come in the same way.

Mr. TRUMBULL. But some of them would not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is possible a few might not, but it is obvious that that is the principle of the bill; whereas the principle here is to make a few recently appointed go out anyhow and leave the rest in. However, I care nothing about it, and as it is one o'clock and I wish to take up the tariff bill I will withdraw the call for the yeas and nays and take the question on a division, and settle it one way or the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The call for the yeas and nays can be withdrawn by unanimous consent only. Is there any objection?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir; let the question be taken by yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion is that the Senate reconsider its vote concurring with the House of Representatives in amending this bill. Those who are in favor of reconsidering will as their names are called answer "yea."

Mr. FESSENDEN. Was there any objection to the call for the yeas and nays being withdrawn?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understood; but the Chair will put the question again. The Senator from Maine, on whose call the yeas and nays were ordered, asks the unanimous consent of the Senate to withdraw that call. Is there any objection?

Mr. HENDRICKS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection is made, and the call cannot be withdrawn.

Mr. WILLEY. As the yeas and nays are to be taken I desire to state that my colleague [Mr. VAN WINKLE] has been detained from his seat for several days by indisposition.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 15, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Buckalew, Cowan, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Hendricks, Johnson, Morrill, Nesmith, Norton, Patterson, Saulsbury, Willey, and Williams—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Brown, Cattell, Chandler, Conness, Creswell, Edmunds, Fogg, Fowler, Frelinghuysen, Grimes, Harris, Henderson, Howe, Kirkwood, Lane, Morgan, Ramsey, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, Sumner, Trumbull, and Wilson—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Cragin, Davis, Guthrie, Howard, McDougall, Nye, Poland, Pomeroy, Riddle, Ross, Van Winkle, Wade, and Yates—13.

So the motion to reconsider was rejected.

PRINTING OF DOCUMENTS.

Mr. SUMNER submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That one thousand extra copies of the message of the President, with the accompanying documents on the subject of the Paris Exhibition, be provided for the use of the Senate, and two thousand copies for the use of the Department of State.

Mr. CONNESS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That one thousand additional copies of the report of Admiral Davis, of the Naval Observatory, on inter-oceanic canals and railroads be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. CONNESS submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That ten thousand copies of the report of J. Ross Browne to the Treasury Department of the statistics of mines and mining be printed for the use of the Senate.

THE TARIFF BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The morning hour having expired, it becomes the duty of the Chair to call up the unfinished business of yesterday, which is the bill (H. R. No. 718) to provide increased revenue from imports, and for other purposes; and that bill is now before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole. The reading of the amendment reported by the Committee on Finance will be proceeded with from the point where the reading terminated last evening.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Before the reading is proceeded with I desire to go back and make a few amendments. The first is on page 31, in line one hundred and fifty-nine of section seven. The committee have ascertained that raising the duties so much on iron and not raising them on wood-screws has had the effect to make the duty on iron so large that it affords no protection whatever on the screws, and therefore I move in line one hundred and fifty-nine to strike out "eight" and insert "nine;" and in line one hundred and sixty to strike out "eleven" and insert "twelve;" so as to make the clause read:

On screws, commonly called wood-screws, two inches or over in length, nine cents per pound; less than two inches in length, twelve cents per pound.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line twenty-six of section nine, page 42, "a half" should be "one quarter of a;" so as to read:

On arsenious acid, one quarter of a cent per pound.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 44, after line seventy-three of that section, I move to insert:

On crude aniline oil, ten per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Now, in line seventy-five I move to strike out "and on aniline."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 47, line one hundred and fifty-seven of section nine, I move to strike out the word "and" after "potassium," and after "sodium" to insert "and of ammonium;" so as to read:

On bromide of potassium, of sodium, and of ammonium, sixty-five cents per pound.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On the same page I move to strike out lines one hundred and sixty-three to one hundred and sixty-six, inclusive, of that section, as follows:

On corrosive sublimate, cyanide, and iodide of mercury, red oxide of mercury, red precipitate, and all salts and preparations of mercury, not otherwise herein provided for, fifteen cents per pound.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

On corrosive sublimate and red oxide of mercury or red precipitate, fifteen cents per pound.

On all salts and preparations of mercury, not otherwise herein provided for, twenty per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to strike out from line two hundred and thirty-three, on page 50, to line two hundred and fifty-six, on page 51, inclusive, and to insert in lieu thereof the following, which is a better arranged classification:

On extract of cannabis indica, or Indian hemp, or gunjah, opium when strictly an official extract for medical use, $4 50 per pound.

On extracts of colocynth, colocynth compound, eubebæ, ipæacuanha, jalap, nux vomica, and rhubarb, two dollars per pound.

On extract of acornite, arnica, belladonna, calumba or calumbo, chamomile or anthemism, colchicum, conium, cicuta or hemlock, digitalis or fox glove, hellebore, humulus or hops, hyocyamus, papaver or poppy, quassia, rhubarb, stramonium, taraxacum or dandelion, and valerian, one dollar per pound.

On extracts of duleamarn or bitter sweet, gentian, butter-nuts, lettuce, and squill, fifty cents per pound.

On lactuarium, two dollars pound.

On extracts of cinchona or Peruvian barks, $3 50 per pound.

On extract of elaterium, or elaterium, sixty cents per ounce.

On all medicinal extracts not otherwise herein provided for, forty per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 57, line four hundred and fourteen of section nine, after the words "bene oil" I move to insert "and, on cotton-seed oil;" so as to read:

On linseed, flaxseed, hemp-seed, and rape-seed oil, and on oil of sesame or bene oil, and on cotton-seed oil, twenty-three cents per gallon.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 61, line five hundred and four of section nine, I move to strike out the words "all extracts and" at the end of the line; so as to read:

On opium prepared for smoking, and on other preparations of opium, not otherwise herein provided for, one hundred per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 75 I move to strike out lines one hundred and eighteen, one hundred and nineteen, and one hundred and twenty of section ten, and to insert in lieu of the following:

On manufactures of ivory, bone, horn, wood, leather, India-rubber, gutta percha for umbrellas, parasols, canes, whips, and furniture trimmings, forty per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to strike out the words "and statutory" in line one hundred and fifty-three of that section, page 76. The subject-matter is provided for in another place.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That modification will be made, no objection being interposed.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to strike out lines one hundred and ninety-eight, one hundred and ninety-nine, and two hundred of that section, on page 78, and in lieu of them to insert:

On plaits, braids, flats, lace trimmings, spray fissues, willow sheets, and squares, used for making or ornamenting hats, bonnets, caps, and hoods, and not further manufactured, composed of straw, chip, grass, palm-leaf, willow, or any other vegetable substance, or of hair or whalebone, twenty-five per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to strike out lines two hundred and eleven, two hundred and twelve, and two hundred and thirteen of that section, on page 78, and insert in lieu of them:

On umbrella and parasol sticks, frames, tips, runners, stretchers, handles, or other parts thereof, when made in whole or in chief part of iron, steel, or any other metal, sixty per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to insert between lines seventy-five and seventy-six of section eleven, on page 82, as a new paragraph:

On glass demijohns of one gallon contents capacity or less, ten cents per demijohn; over one gallon capacity and not over three gallons, seven cents per gallon; over three gallons five cents per gallon.

On carboys for each gallon contents capacity: five cents.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to strike out the proviso on page 90, beginning with line twenty-seven of section fifteen to line thirty-five, inclusive, in these words:

Provided, That loss of quantity of the fruits above-named by decay on the voyage shall be admitted when such loss shall be of full packages or other separable portions; and on oranges and lemons in box loss of quantity may be allowed where such loss reaches thirty-three per cent. of the quantity in the boxes, such loss being certified by the appraisers of damage; but no other loss or damage shall be allowed in abatement of duty.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. On page 94 I move to strike out lines thirty-one and thirty-two of section sixteen, and in lieu of them to insert:

On all cabinet wares, cabinet and house furniture finished, writing and toilet cases, work-boxes, ornamental and mantel clocks, all carved or other wood whether inlaid or embellished with paintings, not herein otherwise provided for, forty per cent. ad valorem.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Secretary may now proceed with the reading.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The reading of the amendment of the Committee on Finance reported as a substitute, where it terminated last evening, will now be resumed.

The Secretary read section nineteen of the substitute, as follows:

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act the importation of the articles mentioned and embraced in this section shall be absolutely prohibited; and if imported or presented for entry in any collection district of the United States shall be declared forfeited, and shall be forfeited and disposed of as the Secretary of the Treasury may direct.

First. False or counterfeit money, or plates or dies for printing the same.

Second. Indecent or obscene books, prints, paintings, photographs, cards, lithographs, engravings, or any other indecent or obscene articles.

Three. Articles of foreign manufacture, and any package of such articles bearing any names, brands, marks, or devices, being or purporting to be the names, brands, marks, or devices of any manufacturer or producer residing in the United States.

Four. Fire-crackers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line four, after the word "imported," I move to strike out the words "or presented for entry."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. After "United States," in line sixteen, at the end of item "three," I move to insert:

Unless authorized by such manufacturer or producer, of which fact proof satisfactory to the collector shall be presented.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. After "fire-crackers," in line seventeen, I move to insert the following proviso:

Provided, That all fire-crackers actually placed on ship-board prior to the 1st day of May, 1867, for exportation to the United States from the country where manufactured, shall be admitted to entry on payment of the rates of duty established by law at the time of the passage of this act: And provided further, That fire-crackers may be imported and bonded for shipment or reexportation to foreign countries.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Section twenty of the substitute was next read, as follows:

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That in all cases of claims for return of duties on imports on account of damages occurring on the voyage of importation, where the damage so determined under existing laws shall exceed twenty-five per cent. of the value of the merchandise damaged, the same shall be sold at public auction by the collector, under the same condition as now regulate the sale of imported merchandise by the collectors of customs, and the amount of damage awarded shall be determined by such sale; the sound value of the merchandise to be determined by the appraiser of damage: Provided, That when, in the judgment of the collector, the public interest require it, the said sale may be made by the importer after due and sufficient notice; and in such case the report of said sale shall be made to the collector, and shall be attested by the importer, on oath, as being bona fide to the highest bidder.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line two the words "allowance of" should be inserted before the word "return," and in line three the word "damages" should be "damage;" so as to read:

That in all cases of claims for allowance of return of duties on imports on account of damage occurring, &c.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those corrections will be made.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line eight I move to strike out the word "imported" before "merchandise," and to insert "unclaimed."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line eleven I move to strike out the words "appraiser of damage," and to insert "duly authorized officer or officers of customs."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line thirteen, after the words "sale may be made," I move to insert "at auction."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In lines fifteen and sixteen I move to strike out the words "and shall be attested by the importer, on oath, as being," and to insert "with satisfactory proof, on oath, to the collector that such sale has been."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read section twenty-one of the substitute, as follows:

SEC. 21. And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of April, 1867, there shall be allowed on the following articles, when exported, a drawback equal to the amount of duty paid on the imported materials used in the manufacture thereof, less five per cent. on the amount of such drawback, which shall be retained for the use of the United States; and such drawback shall be ascertained in accordance with regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury, namely: on mowing machines, reaping machines, ploughs, axes, hatchets, scythes, cotton-gins, shovels, spades, hoes, hay and manure forks, chisels, augers, and carpenters' tools.

The Secretary read section twenty-two of the substitute, as follows:

SEC. 22. And be it further enacted, That on and after the 1st day of April, 1867, there shall be allowed and paid a drawback equal in amount to the import duty paid on all iron, copper, and cordage, which shall be wrought up into the construction of sailing vessels of the United States, or used in repairing vessels of foreign build, documented in conformity with the provisions of the act of 23d December, 1852, less five per cent. on the amount of such drawback, which shall be retained for the use of the United States under such regulations as the Secretary of the Treasury may prescribe: Provided, That the word iron as herein used shall not be construed to include any manufactured article of iron.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line four I move to strike out the words "iron, copper, and cordage," and to insert "lumber, hemp, manila, copper, and upon all iron not advanced in manufacture beyond bars, rods, and bolts."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line five, after the word "construction," I move to insert "rigging or equipment," and after the word "sailing," to insert "or steam;" so as to read:

Which shall be wrought up into the construction, rigging, or equipment of sailing or steam vessels of the United States, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to strike out the proviso at the end of the section in these words:

Provided, That the word iron as herein used shall not be construed to include any manufactured article of iron.

That is struck out, because we have provided for it by other words, which render the proviso unnecessary.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read section twenty-three of the substitute, as follows:

SEC. 23. And be it further enacted, That any goods, wares, or merchandise imported into the United States, upon which an ad valorem duty is imposed by law, may be taken by the United States upon the payment to the consignee thereof of the dutiable value of such goods, wares, or merchandise as stated by the invoice thereof at the place of exportation, and in addition to such invoice value ten per cent. thereof and the freight, insurance, and charges to the place of importation. That it shall be the duty of the collector of the port of importation of any of such goods, wares, or merchandise, whenever in his opinion such goods, wares, or merchandise are undervalued to an amount equal to ten per cent. of the invoice value thereof, to take possession of such goods, wares, or merchandise as the property of the United States, and to sell the same under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Treasury. And to ascertain such undervaluation he shall cause full and detailed inventory and valuation to be made, a copy whereof shall be delivered to the said consignee. And the Secretary of the Treasury is hereby authorized to pay such consignee the said dutiable value, and ten per cent. thereof, and the said freight, insurance, and charges, in coin, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, and for such purpose a sum sufficient is hereby appropriated.

And the Secretary of the Treasury is required to report to Congress annually the several seizures and sales made under this section.

Mr. FESSENDEN. In line five I move to strike out the word "dutiable," before the word "value," and to insert "entered or declared;" and in line seven to strike out the word "invoice," before the word "value."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Those corrections will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. FESSENDEN. After section twenty-three I move to insert two new sections, to be sections twenty-four and twenty-five:

SEC. 24. And be it further enacted, That a discriminating duty of ten per cent. ad valorem, in addition to the duties imposed by law, shall be levied, collected, and paid on all goods, wares, and merchandise which on and after the day this act shall take effect shall be imported in ships or vessels not of the United States: Provided, That this discriminating duty shall not apply to goods, wares, and merchandise which shall be imported on and after the day this act takes effect in ships or vessels not of the United States, entitled by treaty or by any act or acts of Congress to be entered in the ports of the United States, on payment of the same duties as shall then be paid on goods, wares, and merchandise imported in ships or vessels of the United States.

SEC. 25. And be it further enacted, That on and after the day and year this act shall take effect, there shall be levied, collected, and paid on all goods, wares, and merchandise of the growth or produce of countries east of the Cape of Good Hope, except raw cotton when imported from places west of the Cape of Good Hope, a duty of ten per cent. ad valorem in addition to the duties imposed on any articles when imported directly from the place or places of their growth or production: Provided, That said duty of ten per cent. shall not apply to goods, wares, and merchandise exempt from duty.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The Secretary read the twenty-fourth [twenty-sixth] and last section of the substitute, as follows:

SEC. [24] 26. And be it further enacted, That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with the provisions of this act, shall, on and after — day of — be repealed: Provided, That the existing laws shall extend to and be in force for the collection of the duties imposed by this act for the prosecution and punishment of all offenses, and for the recovery, collection, distribution, and remission of all fines, penalties, and forfeitures, as fully and effectually as if every regulation, penalty, forfeiture, provision, clause, matter, and thing to that effect in the existing laws contained had been inserted in, and reenacted by this act: And provided further, That all goods, wares, and merchandise in bond, or in bonded warehouses, on which duties have not been paid, shall, after this law takes effect, pay all the rates of duty imposed by this act.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to fill the blank with the "1st day of April, 1867."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. ANTHONY. I did not hear distinctly the last amendment which was read, imposing a differential duty on articles imported from beyond the Cape of Good Hope.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is the same provision we have in our existing laws.

Mr. ANTHONY. Is the differential duty applied on cotton?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Everything, I presume.

Mr. ANTHONY. That has been left off two or three times by temporary provisions, as the Senator will recollect.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator can bring that matter up by and by, by an amendment to the section, and in the mean time he can see what the law is on the subject. I hardly know whether it applies to Surat cotton or not; but perhaps there is no reason why that should be excepted. The exception existed during the war, I know.

Mr. ANTHONY. I think there is good reason for it now if the provision applies to that.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are one or two blanks to be filled. In the first line of the first section of the amendment I move to insert "1st day of April, 1867."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The blank will be so filled in order to make it correspond with the close of the bill.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move the same amendment in line one hundred and eleven of section one, page 5.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The blank will be so filled there for the same reason.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There are no other amendments of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. CATTELL. Mr. President, the importance of the bill now under consideration overcomes my reluctance to trespass upon the time of the Senate, and induces me to attempt the expression of the general views which govern me in advocating the principles upon which the bill is founded. In the statement of these views I shall not, at this period of the discussion, enter into an examination of the details of the bill, as to which there may be differences of opinion even among those who favor its general principles.

In most, if not all civilized countries, the needs of the Government under ordinary circumstances are provided for mainly from import duties, this being the easiest and surest and least objectionable form of raising revenue. But the principles upon which these duties should be levied have given rise to much discussion among both practical statesmen and scholars who have written upon political economy. The extreme views are held on the one hand by the advocates of free trade in its full sense as a rule applicable to all nations and under all circumstances, and on the other hand, by those protectionists whose views, if logically carried out, would end in absolute prohibition. In my judgment the truth here, as in so many other cases, lies in the middle ground.

In the consideration of the subject before us it might be interesting and instructive to trace the rise and progress of the doctrine of protection to home industry in the kingdom of Great Britain, which has risen to be the greatest manufacturing country in the world; a doctrine pushed at some periods even in the present century to the point of actual prohibition, and stubbornly maintained until the development of England's resources and industry enabled her to produce more cheaply than any other nation. But I will not consume the time of the Senate in any such extended review of this history, but content myself at this point, with saying that the principle of protection to home industry was recognized and applied in Great Britain during the last century and a half until all industrial pursuits had been so stimulated and capital so much increased and cheapened that foreign competition was no longer feared. As a single illustration, the duties on iron were raised by Parliament fifteen times in a period of little over a century, commencing about the year 1700; and so late as a period within the memory of some who hear me, 1819, the import duty on certain kinds of small iron was £20 per ton, and on hoop £23 15s., the one a little under, and the other something over $100 per ton! Other illustrations might be given if it were necessary, but the fact that England's policy was that of protection during this period is familiar to you all.

This decided, unwavering adherence to the doctrine of protection, sternly enforced by the British Parliament and made effective by the adoption so far as practicable of specific instead of ad valorem duties, built up England's supremacy in iron making, rapidly developed her resources, stimulated her commerce, and added immensely to her wealth. The results vindicated the wisdom and sagacity of her statesmen in the adoption of the system of protection, when such protection was needed to encourage and develop her infant manufactures, until she was able to compete with and in fact surpass all other nations in producing cheaply the more important of the manufactures required in civilized countries. Nay, more, Great Britain influenced by these views of the protective policy, even ignored the admitted principles of political economy (if there be any settled principles of the so-called science) by excessive import duties on food. By the adoption of a sliding scale, she virtually prohibited importations until the price of wheat grown upon her own soil should reach the extreme figures of eighty shillings per quarter, (about $2 50 per bushel,) and it was not until the serious failure of the crops in 1846, resulting in the great famine, that this unnecessary burden was lifted from the backs of the toiling millions. It should be observed, however, that this protection of the agricultural interests stimulated high culture until the improved husbandry brought the production up to its maximum point, and in some degree compensated for the evils always resulting from excessive import duties upon food.

And now the object of protection having been gained in Great Britain by the encouragement of domestic competition, resulting in ability to produce as cheaply as any other nation, and needing a market for her surplus, she naturally and wisely adopts as her interest the doctrine of free trade, and while for more than a century she barred the doors of her custom-house against the surplus of other countries, she would now fain persuade other nations whose conditions are similar to hers of the last century rather than of the present that the doctrine is applicable to them. I need scarcely remind the Senate that the American nation is the one above all others which the British statesmen of the present day seem most anxious to convert to their newly-discovered principle in the laws of trade.

Our consul at Liverpool, a sagacious observer, writes to a friend in Washington, May 19:

"Great efforts will now be made by English capitalists and manufacturers to induce us to reduce our tariff and permit them to do all our manufacturing. They are beginning to stir this matter already. Our warm personal friends will be put forward to move the matter, such men as John Bright, Goldwin Smith, and others, who have stood by us through this war. I have seen decisive evidence of this purpose here. They will struggle hard to break down our tariff; there will be a terrible pressure put upon the Government."

We are well aware that the persistent, vigorous, and often unscrupulous efforts of British manufacturers and capitalists "to break down our tariff" are for the selfish purpose of making England the workshop of the world, thus advancing their own private interests; but the character of the gentlemen here named, and of others equally honored who share their views, remove from them even the suspicion of unworthy and sordid motives. In my judgment, however, the American people will honor them far more for other things than for urging upon us the adoption of a theory which, while it would tend still further to develop and increase the manufacturing industry of their nation, would be fatal to this interest in our own.

While we concede the wisdom of applying the principles of free trade to their own country in its present condition, we contend that they are not applicable to a country like ours, that has yet to develop its manufactures and needs precisely the protection that Great Britain needed under similar circumstances, and which her law-givers had the sagacity and wisdom to give her.

Mr. President, the difficulties which surround this question will be relieved if we consider that nations, like individuals, require different treatment at different periods of their lives. There are periods when a nation requires for its healthy development different systems of treatment; so different that what is admirably adapted to a nation in certain conditions would be utterly ruinous in conditions that are dissimilar. One of the ablest European writers upon this subject, L. de Tegoborski, says:

"In political economy there are no absolute principles applicable alike to all countries, times, and circumstances. Political economy is a science of observation, consecrated by an examination of the facts which manifest themselves in the creation of wealth and of the causes by which they are produced." "The study of social economy as a moral and political science must be guided and corroborated by practice and experience."—Volume i, p. 451.

I need not further dwell upon a point so plain, nor would it be worth referring to at all were it not evident that this fallacy has strangely deceived so many, whose arguments for universal free trade amount to nothing whatever, unless it be admitted that the same system is applicable to all nations, in every condition and in every degree of their development.

I do not propose to discuss the question whether, in certain conditions of the world, if free trade were universal, the world would be the gainer. Most assuredly each individual nation would not be, if the experiment were tried now when the conditions of nations are so unequal. To test the principle fairly every nation should start even with every other nation, and as we are not here to legislate for the world at large, but for the American Union, it will be time enough for practical men to meet this question when the world at large shall agree to practice universal free trade. For myself I do not expect such a system to be inaugurated until we shall be many centuries nearer that happy and blessed day when "the lion shall lie down with the lamb."

Certainly we shall act the part of wisdom at the present time and under our present circumstances, if instead of—

"To the fascination of a name Surrendering judgment hoodwinked," or suffering ourselves to be captivated by the alliteration of free speech, free press, free trade, we address ourselves to the examination of our actual condition and endeavor to ascertain from the history of other nations that have risen to wealth and power, and from the lessons taught by our own experience, what system, not in conflict with national honor and Christian principle, will most speedily and surely secure to the nation progress, prosperity, and power.

This history teaches us, as I have already observed, that England had a protective policy for centuries, during which her condition resembled ours at present in many respects; and that this policy, supported by Cromwell, Walpole, and Chatham, resulted in making her the greatest manufacturing nation upon the earth. It is also worthy of observation that it was not until the year 1840 that any change of note was made in the British policy, long after her manufactures had arrived at a point that enabled her to defy the world. Even the famous tariff of Sir Robert Peel, adopted in 1842, did not ignore the doctrine of protection. In the debate on the bill Peel himself said:

"I do not abolish all protective duties; on the contrary, the amended tariff maintains many duties that are purely protective as distinguished from revenue duties."

Thus practically ignoring the theories of her own economists.

France, guided by the practical wisdom of the First Napoleon, sternly protected her industrial interests, and especially after the close of the continental wars in 1815, when she adopted the policy of sustaining by all the power of legislation and all the authority of the Government the great increase of manufactures which had been forced into development by the incidents of the war. The example of France in this particular is worthy of our special consideration. Important branches of industrial pursuits were established in our own country by circumstances produced by the late civil war, and we shall exhibit practical statesmanship if we ourselves adopt the policy of France in protecting and sustaining such as are at all adapted to the conditions and resources of our country and the tastes and habits of our people.

Russia, peculiarly an agricultural nation, was behind both England and France in recognizing the true interests of her people. Relying upon agriculture, in view of her enormous territory and capacity to produce the fruits of the soil, she neglected manufactures, and although her advance in agriculture and population was comparatively repaid, manufactures were feebly struggling against the pernicious influences of a mistaken policy, and trade and commerce languished. Count Nesselrode in 1821, in an official document, declared that Russia was—

"compelled by circumstances to recur to a system of independent commerce; that the productions of the empire found no market abroad; that the manufactures of Russia were ruined, or on the verge of ruin; that the money of the country was being carried off into foreign parts, and that the most solid of commercial establishments were at the brink of destruction."

Count Nesselrode was too clear-sighted a statesman not to discover that the disease which afflicted the body-politic was free trade, and he resolutely applied the remedy. He adopted the system of protection, and under its magic influence the dormant energies of the country were aroused. Productions, manufacturing and agricultural, increased; and trade and commerce felt the swell of general prosperity. I need not point the Senate to the present flourishing condition of the Russian empire and attempt to describe how much of her prosperity she owes to these forty years protection of her home industry. Nor will I stop to inquire how much she is indebted to the intellectual and moral influences resulting from the increased activity thus produced among her people for that higher type of civilization that has given freedom and manhood to the serf.

But we need not look into the history of the European nations alone for confirmation of the truth that national prosperity and national progress are promoted by a proper protection of manufacturing industry. Our own country affords us the most striking illustration. Indeed, eminent English writers have been constrained to admit the beneficial tendency of our protective policy. One of them remarks:

"The most prosperous of all nations for the last fifty years has been the United States, yet the exports and imports of the American Union, notwithstanding its vast augmentation in population, are not very much greater than they were in 1805. It is the unregistered home production and home trade, doubled and quadrupled over and over again, that has created this unexampled prosperity."—Buies, p. 131.

That this writer is correct in referring our "unexampled prosperity" to this increase of "home production and home trade" can scarcely be denied, and all this was effected by our protective policy, so generally known as the "American system." It may be said, however, that the United States have not constantly adhered to the protective system; that we have vibrated in our policy from tariffs for protection to tariffs for revenue simply, and vice versa. The allegation is admitted; and I have only to say on this point that if the true policy had been permanent we should have less need of protection now. That this great country has made progress even under legislation adverse to her industry is admitted; but I assert without fear of successful contradiction that the examination of our history will show that our greatest strides in national prosperity, embracing our agriculture and our commerce, as well as our manufactures, were made during the period when the doctrines of the American system found favor with the law-givers of the nation. When the practical wisdom of Clay and Evans and Simmons prevailed in this Chamber and triumphed over the subtle free-trade fallacies of Calhoun, Hayne, and Hunter, the industry of the nation was quickened and her onward progress accelerated. The impulse thus given to our industrial energy enabled us to make progress for a time even against the disadvantages of the opposite legislation; but every departure from the protective policy has invariably resulted in the end in stagnation of trade, followed by financial embarrassment.

The principle of protection to home productions was early recognized and approved by our fathers; and it is worthy of remark that the policy of protection to American manufactures was assumed in the second legislative act of the First Congress of the United States. That Congress, July 4, 1789, passed "an act for laying duties on goods, wares, and merchandise imported in the United States," the preamble of which reads as follows:

"Whereas it is necessary for the support of the Government, for the discharge of the debts of the United States, and the encouragement and protection of American manufactures, that duties be laid on goods, wares, and merchandise, Be it enacted," &c.

This bill was signed by the immortal Washington, and the policy then adopted has been approved and advocated from that time by most of the leading minds of the nation. But of late years the American system of protection to home industry is met with the objection that this is class legislation for the exclusive benefit of one particular interest, and that every dollar of duties levied on imports for protection is so much tax on the consumer, for which there are no compensatory benefits. This is the one great argument upon which the advocates of free trade mainly rest their case; and although it has been met and answered, in my opinion conclusively, in the books of recent writers in our own country—Cary, Colwell, Colton, and others—and in the speeches of many of our leading statesmen, yet I may be permitted briefly to restate the grounds upon which advocates of protection reject this fallacy.

But first, if this allegation of the free-trade theorists were true, which I do not for a moment admit; it has no force in the present condition of our national finances. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates that there will be required for the year ending June 30, 1868, to meet the expenditures of the Government, to provide for the interest on the public debt, and for the payment of bounties, a revenue of $350,000,000, so that after having arranged your tariff at the highest admissible rate consistent with a due regard to both revenue and protection, you must look to your excise to give you a revenue of nearly or quite two hundred million dollars. Indeed, the receipts of internal revenue for the year 1866 reached the enormous sum of $310,906,984, and of this the manufacturing industry, which is sought to be protected by this bill, paid $178,356,661.

Do you believe that anything like this sum can be realized to the Government from this source during the present fiscal year, unless the much-needed protection be accorded them? The premiums on gold, which acted measurably as a tariff, has fallen, while the high prices of labor remain the same. In this abnormal condition of affairs the munificent contributions made by our manufacturers to the revenue of the Government last year cannot without further legislation on their behalf be repeated, and the more objectionable demand of an increased excise upon the people at large must supply the deficit. But apart from this consideration, we contend that a careful examination of the whole subject will show the utter fallacy of the usual and clamorous free-trade argument that under all circumstances all duties for protection are a tax upon the consumer.

A recent writer upon this point says:

"If protective duties enhance for a time domestic manufactures, they secure afterward lower prices by means of internal competition; for an industry that has reached its development can safely reduce its prices far below those which were necessary to insure its growth, and thus save to its consumers the whole expense of transportation and the whole profits of trade, which are consequent upon imports of the same articles from other countries."—List, p. 80.

The history of our country will fully justify this conclusion. It is competition and development at home that produce lower prices; and while protective duties will reduce foreign competition and perhaps arrest development in other countries, they invite and encourage domestic competition and stimulate the development of our own resources. And when it is remembered that our imports are not more than ten per cent. of our consumption is there not wisdom in encouraging competition at home where the ninety per cent. is produced? And will not this, beside building up the nation, eventually give us a lower range of prices than the practice of the opposite doctrine? Will not the encouragement given by protection invite capital into manufactures; attract to our shores the skilled workmen of other lands; stimulate enterprise and quicken the activities of our people, until the manufacturer will find a sharper competition at his own door than the one three thousand miles away?

Let me illustrate by the statement of a case with which we are all familiar. Before the war, say in 1860, the price of anthracite coal delivered at Philadelphia was three dollars to three dollars and a quarter per ton. The capital engaged in its production and the collieries then opened were sufficient to meet the constantly increasing wants of the country in a normal condition of affairs. In fact capital, in view of the previous prosperity of the trade, had been attracted to it, until the supply was in advance of the demand.

A distinguished gentleman, largely engaged in the mining of coal, writes me as follows:

"For a number of years prior to the war the coal business was much depressed. Most of the operators were bankrupt, the cost of production exceeding the market price, except in favored localities."

But the inauguration of the war threw suddenly a largely increased demand on the source of supply. As a consequence the market rose rapidly, until the price reached ten dollars per ton at Philadelphia. At this price coal mining was among the most profitable occupations. The enterprising capitalists saw this at a glance, and were attracted in that direction. New collieries were opened; those already engaged in the business were stimulated to increased production; and what is the result? Why, the increase of production in 1866 to November 1 over that of the corresponding year of 1865 was two million eight hundred and thirty-six thousand seven hundred and eighty-two tons. As a consequence the price of coal has fallen in Philadelphia to about five dollars per ton, a price actually below the cost of production at the present prices of labor. This illustration is drawn from the movement of anthracite coal; but the same results—of domestic competition—are observable in the movements of bituminous coal. During the war prices at Pittsburg ran up to thirteen cents per bushel, which stimulated production and increased the supply; and the price was consequently reduced until the article is now freely offered at seven cents per bushel. I submit that such is the natural and usual result of home competition, and that when protection is necessary to induce this competition it is the interest of all classes of the nation to accord it. But still further I propose to show that facts sustain this principle, by a reference to the prices of a few leading articles before and after they were produced by the American manufacturer.

The tariff bill approved May 22, 1824, levied a rate of duty equal to eight cents per square yard on the coarser qualities of unbleached four-quarter cotton muslins. For a brief period the price of this article was advanced somewhat over that prevailing previous to the passage of the tariff act referred to. But the encouragement given by protection on this class of goods induced capitalists in different sections of the country to erect factories and to engage in the manufacture of an article so largely consumed by our people. The natural result followed. The energy and skill of our people, and the improvement of machinery adapted to the manufacture of these goods, were such that the consumer through the working of home competition was supplied with an article of superior quality to the imported, at a cost of seven and a half cents, being actually one half cent per yard below the duty levied. Another illustration may be cited of more recent date; that of the finer grades of cast steel, for which a few years ago we were entirely dependent upon the Old World. A number of original invoices now in my possession from prominent English steel manufacturers' agents on this side, dated in the years 1850, 1852, 1853, 1855, 1856, and 1857, show that during these years, when the duties on steel were far below the present rates, being as low in the year 1857 as twelve per cent. ad valorem, (equal to about one and a quarter cent per pound, as shown by the custom-house valuation,) the price of best cast steel averaged fifteen cents, and the maximum sixteen and a half.

Invoices and offers made by the very same manufacturers' agents during the present month, the existing tariff upon the same grade being three cents per pound, show an average decline of one and a quarter cent per pound. This is comparatively a new branch of manufactures, and the figures I have given show that, working under a protective duty of three cents per pound, the energy and enterprise of our own people have forced the English manufacturer to reduce his rate one and a quarter cent per pound, saving to the American consumer twenty-five dollars on every ton used.

But a singular confirmation of the truth that domestic competition, which is always induced by protection, actually reduces prices is found in a recent memorial sent to the Finance Committee by some of the most eminent railroad men in the country. Representing the interests of their roads, and desiring of course to purchase steel rails as cheaply as possible, they ask that the increased duty on steel proposed by the House bill be sustained. They state the pregnant fact that the present extensive preparations to produce Bessemer steel rails in our own country have compelled the foreign agents to reduce the price of theirs forty dollars per ton. But I will read the memorial with the names of the distinguished gentlemen which are appended, and let them speak for themselves:

To the Finance Committee of the Senate of the United States:

We, the undersigned, respectfully represent—

1. That in our opinion it is highly important for the interests of American railroad companies, and the builders and users of American machinery, that the business of manufacturing Bessemer steel rails, axles, boiler-plate, forging, &c., in this country should be commenced and carried to such an extent that, in case of war with a foreign Power or other contingency, we may be capable of supplying our whole domestic demand.

2. That previous to the present extensive preparations in this country for producing Bessemer steel rails, forgings, &c., foreign agents charged $150 per ton in gold for the same rails that they reduced to $110 per ton in gold when they became aware that such preparations were being made; thus showing the necessity for a home supply in order that the foreign article may be obtained at a reasonable rate.

3. That we are credibly informed that large works for manufacturing Bessemer steel for rails, forgings, &c., are in course of erection at Troy, New York; Harrisburg and Chester, Pennsylvania; Cleveland, Ohio, and Detroit, Michigan; and that capable gentlemen are awaiting the result of the present action on the tariff bill before beginning to build works of the same kind already planned, at Mott Haven, New York; Pittsburg, Johnstown, and Bethlehem, Pennsylvania; Baltimore, Maryland; Cincinnati, Ohio, and St. Louis, Missouri, which works, if built, will more than supply the present domestic demand.

Now, therefore, we respectfully ask that the House bill, placing two and a half cents per pound duty on steel rails, and three and four cents per pound on other articles of Bessemer steel of more difficult manufacture, be sustained; and that all steel rails contracted for previous to July 1, 1866, be permitted to enter the country at the present duty of forty-five per cent. ad valorem.

One other illustration, and I have done on this point. An extensive manufacturer of iron in Pennsylvania, in reply to some inquiries I made, writes me as follows:

"In regard to the iron business before and since the war we submit the following: the highest price iron touched during the war was eight and a half cents per pound for common bar. It is now four and a half cents; but to compete with foreign iron must be sold at four cents. Labor is as high as it ever was during the past five years; and unless there is a general decline in prices of everything that enters into daily economy of life we cannot bring it down in anything like the same proportion that the price of the product has fallen.

"Another point: iron averaged during the ten years before the war two and three fourths to three cents per pound for common bars. Reduce our price of five cents to gold at thirty-three per cent., and it shows we would now sell New American iron at three and three fourths cents gold; and we do not fear to predict that should even a majority of articles follow gold down to par iron would sympathize to a greater extent than the above relative prices. In some particular descriptions of iron, in hoops, sheet, and light sizes, prices have actually been lower—computing value in gold—than before the war. Home competition has done this; but we do not fear that; it is the fault of the individual manufacturer if his American rival can outstrip him."

But there is still another view of this subject.

I have already said that the imports did not exceed ten per cent. of our consumption. In other words, the industry of our own land supplies us with ninety per cent. of our wants.

Now, suppose by an unwise system of legislation you expose our manufacturers, without protection, to the ruinous competition of the cheaper labor and cheaper capital of Europe and thus break them down; suppose you put out the fires of the forge and the rolling-mill, arrest the shuttle of the weaver, and still the music of the spindle, what will be the inevitable result as to price? You thus throw upon the workshops of Europe the demand to supply the whole of our enormous wants. Their capacity is about equal to the wants of their customers, as things now stand, and consequently the demand when increased by the volume of your entire wants will far exceed the supply. Then, by the inexorable law of trade, prices must rise. You get now the ten per cent. of your wants cheap because you produce the other ninety per cent. Close up your workshops and throw your whole demand upon those of Europe and you aid in building up the industry of other nations upon the wreck of your own. In this view of the case the interest of people of all classes is promoted by protection to home industry, and that can hardly be called class legislation, which, in the end, benefits all classes and tends to develop the mighty empire which God has given for our heritage.

But, Mr. President, the argument rests on a much broader basis, which is, that the prosperity of the manufacturing interests invariably brings prosperity to every other department of industry. There is harmony between the agricultural, manufacturing, and commercial industry of a well-regulated nation. If I may be allowed to use a figure, agriculture may be considered the framework and foundation of the body-politic, as the bones and muscles and sinews are of the body-organic; manufacturing industry fitly represents the life blood, while trade and commerce constitute the heart, whose mighty pulsations send the life-giving current through every artery and vein. As a healthful condition of all the parts of the human body assures a perfect development of the man, so a healthful condition of all the departments of industry is essential to the perfect development of a nation. If manufactures languish you cannot have a healthful, natural condition; for if the blood be impoverished and the supply scanty, the pulsation of the heart will be lessened and weakened, and for want of a proper supply of nourishment torpor will ensue and paralysis will finally settle on the entire organism.

In respect to commerce, this harmony of interests arises from the fact that our home industry is the basis of all our prosperity. It is a well-established fact that foreign commerce flourishes just in proportion to the nation's productive energy and power of consumption. In a country so vast as ours, stretching from ocean to ocean and "from the icy north to torrid climes," with every variety of soil and climate, with its fertile valleys, its broad prairies, its beautiful savannahs, its mighty rivers, and its inland seas, its hills of gold and its mountains of silver, its inexhaustible supplies of coal and iron, the "twin sisters of civilization," there is no limit of wealth and power of which human thought can conceive which cannot be reached by the industrial forces of our people if they be aided by wise and judicious legislation. It is to the development of these great resources, the gift of a beneficent God, that we must look for national wealth and power and individual prosperity and happiness. Whatever tends to stimulate this development increases the prosperity of every class.

A careful examination will show that under our varying system of protection foreign commerce flourished most when the activity of the laboring masses was the greatest, and he is behind the age in which he lives and an inattentive observer of the progress of our own and other nations who objects to the protective policy on the ground that it militates against commerce. England's commercial supremacy was acquired during a system of protection to her manufacturing industry more rigid and effective than any ever adopted by the United States, or than any now proposed by the most earnest advocates of protection. Look at the figures of the Russian empire. Her foreign commerce shows a total movement of imports and exports in 1822, under the free-trade policy, of but 92,065,000 roubles; while after the better system of protection to her manufactures, which we are so positively assured militates against commerce, had been in operation for thirty years, the total movement showed in 1853, the latest dates at my command, 246,605,000 roubles, an increase of two hundred and fifty per cent. Do these figures sustain the idea that commerce is dwarfed under the protective system? The power to produce and the ability to consume in a nation is what makes commerce, and both these conditions result when the operatives are fully employed and fairly paid. To secure these results you must protect your workmen from the ill-paid, ill-clad, ill-fed labor of the Old World. But if it could be shown that this policy did somewhat interfere with our foreign commerce, I submit that the most ample compensation would come from the increase of our domestic commerce. Commerce in its full sense embraces both foreign and domestic, and if the loss in one branch is more than compensated by the gain in the other, is the nation a loser; or can it with any propriety be said, under such a condition of things, that commerce languishes?

In foreign commerce there is of necessity some division of profits with the nation with which you trade. With domestic commerce the net results are all your own. Beside the prosperity of a country, so far as it results from foreign commerce, may be interrupted, disturbed, or annihilated by foreign legislation or by war. The relative importance of the two branches of commerce will be seen by a comparison of the movement of each, and I ask your attention to a few figures bearing upon this point. These figures are taken from statistical reports prepared by Mr. Delmar, the very able chief of the Bureau of Statistics connected with the Treasury Department, and now in course of publication. The entire table is so interesting and instructive that I give it in full, although a small portion of it only is necessary for my present line of argument:

Value in gold of the annual product of the people of the United States—1860.

Engaged in agriculture.....	$1,608,963,917
Engaged in manufacture.....	916,699,948

 Same reduced to currency at 140, estimate for 1866.....$9,457,823,139

Of the $6,755,000,000 (gold value) produced in 1860, $6,000,000,000 were consumed during the same time, leaving a surplus or annual gain to the people's combined wealth of $755,000,000.

As the product of 1866 was about the same in gold value as that of 1860, and the surplus of course the same, the latter amounted in currency in 1866 at 140 for gold to $1,057,000,000; and of this amount $561,000,000 in currency was paid to the Government in the form of taxes.

These figures are not only interesting and instructive in their detail, but the grand total of the people's earnings in currency ($9,457,823,139) almost surpasses belief, and induces the thought that the human mind is scarcely capable of conceiving the vastness of the material resources of the nation when the energy and enterprise of our people shall have been fully developed. And if the premises upon which the table is made and the conclusions drawn therefrom be correct, the astounding fact is developed that the industry of the nation paid during the year 1865 in taxes to the Government more than half of the net profits of the whole people.

But my chief purpose in producing this table is to show the immense volume of our domestic commerce and to draw therefrom a comparison of it with the results of our foreign commerce, in confirmation of my assertion that our domestic commerce far outstrips our foreign in importance to the nation, $1,500,000,000 against $190,000,000. Think of it, and tell me whether I am extravagant in saying that in view of such figures our foreign commerce sinks into comparative insignificance. The American system, by giving activity and volume to our domestic trade, assures the increasing development and onward progress of our domestic commerce.

Having thus seen, by an examination of the history of other nations and by the results in our own, that there is no real antagonism to commerce in the encouragement we propose to manufactures, it only remains on this branch of the subject to inquire whether the system of protection is in harmony with the agricultural interest of our country, confessedly the most important element of our national wealth. The advocates of the free-trade theory have employed their most subtle arguments in the attempt to prove that there is an antagonism between the manufacturing and agricultural interests of our country, but I am sure that an honest and faithful examination of the subject will show that such an antagonism exists only in their imagination.

The argument that import duties are a direct tax upon the consumer, without any compensatory benefit, which, if true, would fall most heavily on agriculture, I have already attempted to answer in the course of these remarks and I but restate what I have said, when I assert that the soundest of the recent writers upon political economy, and especially those of our own country, deny the truth of this assertion, and that they are sustained by a rigid examination of the facts and a careful comparison of results under different systems. I admit that British writers on political economy who assume the hypothesis of free trade have occupied the field for more than half a century, but the unsoundness of their theory has been shown, not only by the close reasoning of later writers, but also by its rejection as a rule of practice by the wisest practical statesmen of all highly prosperous countries.

Napoleon the Great is reported by Las Casas to have said:

"Duties which were so severely condemned by political economists should not, it is true, be an object to the treasury: they should be the guarantee and protection of a nation and should correspond with the nature and objects of its trade. Holland, which is destitute of productions and manufactures, and which has a trade only of transit and commerce, should be free of all fetters and barriers. France, on the contrary, which is rich in every sort of production and manufactures, should incessantly guard against the importations of a rival who might still continue to be superior to her, and also against the cupidity, egotism, and indifference of mere brokers. I have not fallen into the error of modern systematizers who imagine that all the wisdom of nations is centered in themselves. Experience is the true wisdom of nations, and what does all the reasoning of the economists amount to?"

At another time this extraordinary man, when discussing the theories of political economists, is reported to have said:

"If an empire were made of adamant political economists would grind it to dust."

For myself I prefer to accept the practical wisdom of this great man rather than the speculations of Adam Smith and Say and their disciples.

If, then, it has been shown by practical results that, taking a series of years, prices are cheapened rather than advanced by protection to home manufactures, by stimulating home competition, and that there is harmony with instead of antagonism to all the great interests of our country, the foundation upon which the free trade hypothesis is built is destroyed, and the whole fabric falls.

But suppose, for the sake of argument, that the money price of an article was advanced to the extent of the duties imposed, it does not follow that it is actually dearer to the consumer. Full employment to the laborer increases his power to buy and consume; and agriculture confessedly supplies a large part of his wants. The artisan who makes the plow, the ax, the mower, or the reaper, whether he does it in England or America, must be fed. If he be an American artisan the more fully you keep him employed the greater his ability to purchase your products. He must of necessity have bread, and he must therefore be a customer for what the farmer has to sell. While he has been employed in making the ax for the farmer the farmer has been producing the bread for him. He takes your bushel of wheat in pay for the ax he has made for you. Now, before you can decide whether the farmer has actually given more for the ax than one of foreign manufacture would have cost him with the duty imposed, you must settle the question whether more or less than a bushel of wheat is required to procure the ax from a foreign workshop, and pay the importer's profit, the cost of transportation, and the duties levied upon it by Government. Now, the home laboring classes comprise the great body of the farmer's customers, and if they be fully employed and fairly paid, their ability to purchase is increased and the demand for agricultural products is increased, resulting in an advance in prices, which is the usual result of active markets. If they be not employed, the surplus population which can no longer find means of living in factories will be driven to the cultivation of the land and thus become the farmer's competitors instead of his customers.

But, Mr. President, the harmony of interests which exists between agriculture and manufactures, and the truth of the position I have taken, are clearly shown by actual results. I am sure the Senate will excuse me if I draw an illustration from personal observation in my own mercantile life. Twenty years ago last autumn I embarked in the trade in breadstuffs in the city of Philadelphia. At that time, and for some succeeding years, the entire volume of my business was made up of consignments of agricultural products from the valleys of the Susquehanna, the Juniata, and the Lehigh. I have not the figures at command, but I am sure I speak within bounds when I say that my own house and the four or five others doing business from the same points must have received from this quarter four to five million bushels of cereals per annum. Philadelphia is still the natural market for the surplus product of this territory, but for some years past there have not been consignments enough received from that entire section to realize commissions sufficient to pay the salary of a receiving clerk. Do you ask, has production fallen off? I answer, no; on the contrary, it has increased, but the whole line of these valleys has been dotted with furnaces and forges and rolling-mills and saw-mills and factories and workshops, filled with operatives, and the consumer of agricultural products has been brought to the farmer's doors. He now finds a readier market for his products at home at prices equal to those ruling on the sea-board, of which he avails himself and thus saves all the cost of transportation and factorage, equal at average prices to about twenty per cent. Nay, more, sir, my own firm has frequently within the past few years sold and shipped to the millers in one of these valleys, that in which the iron interest has been most developed, the Lehigh, wheat drawn from Michigan, Illinois, Wisconsin, and Iowa to supply the deficiency in the consumptive want. And these products of the prairies of the West were sold, too, at a price far in excess of what could have been realized by exportation to any country on the face of the globe. As a consequence of this state of things land has risen in value through all this section, and farms that could have been bought fifteen or twenty years ago at forty or fifty dollars per acre are now salable at one hundred and fifty or two hundred dollars per acre. Villages have grown to be towns, and towns have grown to be cities, agriculture and manufactures have clasped hands and prosperity reigns.

In further confirmation of the view that activity and prosperity in manufactures is favorable to the agricultural industry of the nation, I submit the following extract from a letter written by D. J. Morell, Esq., of the Cambria Iron Works, Johnstown, Pennsylvania:

"The Cambria Iron Works makes a market indirectly for an immense deal of produce which I cannot pretend to trace. They have created and they sustain the population and diversified industries of the city of Johnstown, which would be nothing without them."

In the following table he shows the sources from which this demand is supplied:

Estimated production of rails by the Cambria Iron Works for the present year, ending October 31, 1867.

He adds:

"One thing you will particularly observe. It may seem that in distributing the agricultural products consumed by workmen I have not accorded enough to the locality of the works. I feel certain that I have given too much. So far as the Cambria Iron Company are concerned the local supply of agricultural products, though large, is almost imperceptible. It does not nearly sustain the other industries created by the works, but having no dependence upon them other than the works, are as necessary to their existence as the shining of the sun."

It has been well said:

"Protective duties do not press heavily upon the agriculture of a country. By the development of manufacturing industry, the wealth, population, consumption of agricultural products, and exchangeable value of real estate are vastly increased, while the manufacturer's products consumed by farmers gradually fall in price. Agriculture and manufacturing industry united in the same nation, under the same political power, live in perpetual peace! They are disturbed in their reciprocal action neither by war nor foreign legislation. They insure to a nation the continual development of its prosperity, civilization, and power."

Antagonism between agricultures and manufactures! Protective duties, a class legislation to favor the opulent manufacturers and to oppress the hardy sons of toil! No, no. If charges must be made, we retort that this is but the clamor of those who would have you legislate in favor of the industrial interests of other nations, and I submit that it is the duty as well as the high privilege of the Congress of the United States to legislate for the interests of this nation.

I submit to the gentlemen who so worthily represent the great agricultural States of the West that the adoption of the American system and a faithful adherence to the principles upon which it is based is the true interest of their great and growing empire. The fertile prairies of the West crown the labors of the husbandman with the rich reward of abundant harvests, and our noble water-courses and inland seas and magnificent system of railways enable him to deliver from his abundance to all parts of our widely-extended country. All that is needed to bring prosperity to this class is a steady demand for their products. Encourage manufacturing industry and you increase the number of those who consume your products and add to their ability to buy. All the world over, as a rule, the home customer is the best; his want is steady, constant, sure, and gives you an unfailing market; while the foreign demand, which is insignificant at best, is fitful and contingent, liable at any moment to be interrupted by war or paralyzed by adverse foreign legislation.

The only nation of importance which does not produce food sufficient for its own consumption is Great Britain, while the great nations which lie near her—Russia, France, and Germany—have a surplus to export. The total annual want of Great Britain is about five million quarters, say about forty million bushels. Now, the annual production of wheat and corn in the United States is shown by the census reports to be about one thousand million bushels. If, then, Great Britain were to take from us the whole quantity of her deficit it would only be four per cent. of our crop. But Russia, France, and Germany compete with us for this trade, and the result is that we furnish but a small part of the want. The special commissioner of revenue, Mr. Wells, in his recent report, says:

"Of the value of the whole agricultural products of the country, excluding cotton, rice, and sugar, only two and three fourths per cent. was estimated to have been exported, leaving ninety-seven and one fourth per cent. for the home market and consumption."

Under the depression resulting from the low tariff of 1846, after the spasmodic rise occasioned by the Irish famine of that year had subsided, prices of breadstuffs declined, and, with not the slightest demand for export, prime winter wheat sold in Philadelphia as low as seventy-five cents per bushel, a price which would hardly leave the producer in Iowa and Wisconsin forty cents per bushel. If you destroy manufacturing interests and drive the operatives from the workshop to the cultivation of the field, where are you to find a market for your agricultural products at remunerative prices?

A recent writer has said:

"Chicago alone often sends off in ten days more grain and flour than England has taken from us each year, on an average, for twenty years past; and the grain export from that city in a single day often exceeds what England has bought of us for a whole year."

In the course of a speech made in Boston by J. W. Brooks, Esq., president of the Michigan Central railroad, he said:

"We want a more steady and reliable market for the produce of the great food-producing region. Its power of production has hardly begun to be developed; but even now it is often without a market for its products. The natural buyers of surplus food are the manufacturers, and the great body of them live too far away from us. England does not import food from this country till she has exhausted those nearer home, which usually supply nearly all she requires. Estimating the growers' portion of the price received at twenty-five cents for corn and eighty cents for wheat, the export of breadstuffs for the last eighteen years has yielded to the growers an average of about thirteen million dollars per annum, rising as high as $34,800,000, and falling as low as $860,000 per annum—some years more than forty times as great as others—yielding to the nation a maximum of but a little over one dollar per head, and sometimes falling below three cents. This is too insignificant at best, and too unreliable at all times for so important an interest in our national economy."

Sir, whatever may be the fact in regard to other nations, with us there is unquestionably a harmony of interest between these great sources of our national wealth—agriculture, commerce, manufactures. Our fathers grouped them on our national shield in loving accord, emblematic of unity of interest; and all the subtle sophistry of British writers and the specious arguments of British statesmen, and the clamorous, selfish demands of British manufacturers, will never shake my faith in the conviction that they are those whom God has joined together at the altar of our common country, and no man may put them asunder. And such is the opinion of the people I have the honor in part to represent in this Chamber.

New Jersey speaks on this subject through her worthy Governor, distinguished no less for his practical statesmanship than for his steadfast devotion to the cause of our country in her hour of peril, and his unceasing efforts to minister to the wants of our brave defenders and their families. Governor Ward, in his annual message to the Legislature of New Jersey, which convened a few days ago, says:

"There is another subject of great interest to the nation in the question of properly protecting its capital and industry. We were enabled to pass through four years of a sanguinary and costly war, the magnitude of which is now scarcely realized, by the simple development of our natural resources. Let these resources be steadily fostered and protected and we shall continue to prosper as a nation and as individuals. I believe in an American system which recognizes the duty of protecting our interests and our labor against the foreign policy of free trade. We ought to have no sympathy with those false and pernicious theories which would make us tributary to foreign workshops and foreign labor. True national prosperity consists in well-protected capital, in well-educated and well-qualified labor, and in bringing the manufactory into close proximity to the farm. In our own State there is no division of opinion upon this subject. The least intelligent farmer knows that his close proximity to the mine, the forge, and the workshop is the secret of his real prosperity. He cannot be persuaded that any foreign market for his grain, his fruit, his cattle, or the produce of his dairy will supply the demands which these various branches of labor now create at home. Our large and varied interests are all united in the confident expectation that the Government will give to our industrial resources the protection which is demanded for their full development."

"At no period in our history has it been so important for us to adopt the doctrine of 'protection for the sake of protection' as now. Every dollar of gold exported from our country is a rebuke to the extravagance of our people and to the short-sighted policy of our Government. We are without adequate security that the investments of to-day will be profitable to-morrow. We feel that the financial interests of the country are so largely connected with the prosperity of our home industry that any neglect of this industry will work a sure and lasting injury to the former."

These are the words of wisdom fitly spoken. But there may be those who, while admitting the soundness of the protective policy, will contend that the existing tariff is high enough for the accomplishment of the protectionist's purpose, and that no further increase of duties is necessary.

To this I reply by asking the objector to look at the condition of the manufacturing industry of the nation at the present time.

My daily life is spent among a people largely engaged in the manufacture of iron and steel and in the production of textile fabrics; and I know from personal observation that foreign competition and excessive taxation constitute the upper and nether millstone between which these industrial pursuits are being ground to powder. If you admit the principle of protection to be true, then make your duties sufficiently high to be effective. If you will not do this, abandon the system, I beg you, and do not—

"Keep the word of promise to the ear,
And break it to our hope."

But again, the necessity of some further protection to the industry of the country is conclusively proved by the course of importations for the year 1866, just closed. The enormous increase of imports is alarming, notwithstanding the allowance, which I admit should be made, for increased importations, in view of the probable adoption by the Senate of the higher duties proposed in the House bill of last session.

I am indebted to an intelligent gentleman connected with the customs department for the following figures. At the port of New York alone the imports of foreign merchandise for the year 1866, just closed, reach the enormous sum of $306,618,184, all gold values as invoiced, exclusive of freights, duties, and profits. If we convert this sum into currency it will be found that the value of these importations at this one port will be $439,258,457 currency, an amount far in excess of any previous year. And of these importations very much more than one half come in direct competition with the labor of our own country, as the following figures for the most prominent articles will show:

Principal articles imported in 1866 to New York, competing with American labor.

The aggregate value of the items here cited roughly from the list of importations at New York alone for the calendar year 1866 is nearly one hundred and eighty million dollars in gold value as invoiced, all or at least very nearly all of which comes in direct competition with the labor of our own country.

It is estimated that imports at all other ports are equal to from one fourth to one third of the imports at New York. Call it one fourth, which will be $45,000,000, and you have a total of imports of products competing with our own, in round numbers, $225,000,000. Reduce this to currency at forty per cent. for gold, about the average rate of the year, and you reach the amazing sum of $325,000,000; and remember that this is not the total of imports, but simply that part of them which come in direct competition with our own productions. In currency value, the total imports will, as before stated, exceed $500,000,000. The rapid and excessive increase of imports, which will be shown by the following table, is the strongest evidence I can submit to prove that the present tariff is not sufficient either to protect properly American industry or to save the nation from ruin by over importation.

Comparative table of imports at New York.

	Dry goods.	Earthen and glass wares.	Pig iron.
1863.....	67,274,547	1,704,154	397,916
1864.....	71,589,752	1,979,634	803,788
1865.....	91,965,138	2,014,920	385,788
1866.....	126,222,855	4,204,552	879,733

It will be seen from these figures that the imports of these three leading items for the years 1866 are double those of the year 1863, a fact that may well alarm us. But more than this: these figures, large as they are, do not present the whole truth. The Secretary of the Treasury in his last report to Congress says:

"For many years there has been a systematic undervaluation of foreign merchandise imported into the United States, and large amounts have been smuggled into the country along our extended sea-coasts and frontiers. To make up for undervaluations and smuggling, and for cost of transportation paid to foreign ship-owners, twenty per cent. at least should be added to the imports, which would make the balance for the past year against the United States nearly one hundred million dollars."

If you add the Secretary's estimate for undervaluation, smuggling, &c., say $100,000,000, to the ascertained imports for 1866, you have the enormous sum of between six and seven hundred millions, currency value, as the grand total of imports for the calendar year.

Such a statement may well "give us pause," and when we remember that a very large share of the articles whose values are included in this vast sum can be and would be produced by our own people, under a proper system of protection, which would save them from being driven from the factory and the workshop by the untaxed pauper labor of Europe, the subject is sufficiently important to demand the most serious consideration of Congress.

You must do something to arrest this flood of importation if you would save the nation from utter bankruptcy. Ruin must come to nations as well as individuals when they continue to buy more than they sell, and this is just what our nation is doing now. Let us see. So far the figures I have given were for the calendar year 1866. I propose now to call your attention to some figures from the Secretary of the Treasury's report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866.

During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, the United States imported:

Foreign merchandise free of duty.....	$58,861,759
Foreign merchandise paying duty.....	368,588,051

Of foreign merchandise there was reexported:

Free of duty.....	$1,907,157
Dutiable.....	9,434,263

Total, (mixed gold and currency value).....	11,341,420
Which, reduced to currency value, was equal to.....	10,263,233

Total net imports foreign merchandise, value in gold.....	417,046,577
---	-------------

Amount brought forward.....	$417,046,577
Imports, specie.....	$10,329,156
Of which there was reexported.....	3,400,697
Net imports, specie.....	6,928,459
Total net imports, foreign merchandise and specie.....	423,975,036
During the fiscal year ending June 30, 1866, the United States exported domestic merchandise, currency value, $468,040,903, reduced to gold value, $333,322,085
Specie exported.....	82,643,374

Total domestic exports, value in gold.....	415,965,459
Apparent balance of trade, value in gold.....	$8,009,577

This table shows an apparent balance of only $8,009,577 against us for the fiscal year. But it must be remembered we paid during the year $75,714,915 in specie. To this we must add the Secretary's estimate of twenty per cent for undervaluation, smuggling, &c., say $83,409,315, making a grand total of balance of trade against us for a single year of $167,133,807. Will any Senator tell me how we could have paid the astounding balance but by the exportation of our Government bonds, which will one day return to plague us; and will any gentleman tell me how we are ever to return to specie payments with a continuance of such a policy? Let the Secretary of the Treasury speak. He says:

"Notwithstanding our heavy exports during the past year, (that of cotton having been six hundred and fifty million six hundred and seventy-two thousand eight hundred and twenty pounds, or nearly one million six hundred thousand bales, a quantity greater than our entire crop of the present year,) the United States are largely in debt to Europe. It is evident that the balances have been largely against the United States for some years past, whatever may have been the custom-house returns. On no other ground can the fact be accounted for, that a very large amount of American bonds is now held in Europe, which are estimated as follows, to wit:

United States bonds.....	$350,000,000
State and municipal bonds.....	150,000,000
Railroad and other stocks and bonds.....	100,000,000
	$600,000,000

"It is evident from these figures that the balances are against us, and, chiefly by the exportation of our Government bonds, are being temporarily and improvidently arranged; temporarily, because a large portion of these bonds have been bought on speculation, and will be likely to be returned whenever financial troubles in the countries in which they are held shall make it necessary for the holders to realize upon them, or whenever satisfactory profits can be made by returning them, which will be when they nearly approach their par value in coin; improvidently, because they are being purchased at very low prices, and because their exportation stimulates imports and thus cripples home industry. Nothing is more certain than the fact that there can be no permanent resumption of specie payments in the United States until the balances between them and other nations shall be made easy by an exportation of commodities, including the products of the mines, equal at least to our importations, and until provision shall be made for returning bonds, or for preventing their return at unpropitious times. This state of things, it is conceived, cannot be effected without a change in our financial policy."

It must, therefore, be evident to the most superficial observer, who looks at these facts and figures, that the only road that will lead us to a sounder financial condition, and enable us to reach the desired point of specie payment, is to turn the balance of trade in our favor by buying less abroad and producing more at home. While I am constrained to differ in some points from the distinguished Secretary of the Treasury, I most heartily concur in the views he has so ably presented on this branch of the subject.

Sir, however much this Congress may legislate in regard to the currency; whatever views may prevail as to expansion or contraction; however wisely you may provide for funding your debt and providing for your interest and other Government expenditures, you will fail to reach the disease that is preying upon the vitals of the nation if you do not in some form check these excessive importations.

In my judgment the power to do this lies in the passage of the bill now under consideration. I do not claim, by any means, that it is perfect in its details. It differs in many points from the House bill. It differs in some important points from the recommendation of Mr. Wells, the highly intelligent and eminently faithful special commissioner; and I may say, on some points, the members of the Finance Committee themselves are not all agreed. Its defects may be supplied and its mistakes corrected by the practical wisdom of the Senate; and when this is accomplished I sincerely trust the bill will become a law.

It may be objected that the duties provided in this bill are too high to be consistent with a proper regard to revenue, and that the check upon importations which it may impose will reduce the gold revenue below what is required for the payment of the interest on the public debt.

I think there need be no apprehension on this point. Experience shows that increased rates on what is imported fully compensate for the deficiency in the amount imported. The advance in duties, made by the bill of 1864-65, was in some instances large, and yet the revenue, instead of being decreased thereby, was largely increased.

The committee had this point in view during the entire time the bill was under consideration. It is my opinion, and I think the distinguished chairman of the Finance Committee agrees with me, that the amount of revenue for the next fiscal year would probably be much the same under the proposed bill as it would be if the existing tariff were permitted to stand. In either case the revenue will doubtless fall off, for two reasons: first, we imported last year altogether too much, and more than we could pay for, but for artificial aids, such as the exportation of Government and other bonds; and secondly, the impetus given to importation in view of the anticipated passage of a higher tariff this session has accumulated a surplus that may carry us partly through the coming fiscal year.

Mr. President, I have already trespassed too long on the indulgence of the Senate. A word or two more and I have done. Sir, I speak to-day in behalf of the American laborer, the hardy sons of toil, the bone and sinew of our nation. It is their cause I plead, and I covet for them the best gifts which the nation can bestow. Look over this broad land and see the millions of humble yet happy homes of your industrial classes, where the fire burns brightly on the hearth, and where connubial, parental, and filial affection reigns.

Amid all that is great and glorious in our land I single out the fact that our sons of toil are better fed, better clothed, better lodged, better paid, and better taught than those of any other nation on the face of the earth, and proclaim it as the brightest jewel in our crown of glory.

It is the boast of England that her cheaper labor will always enable her to produce so cheaply as to defy competition. God grant that cheap labor in the English sense may never be the boast of this nation. Under our form of Government the laborer never can be and never ought to be reduced to the condition of those in other lands, who are content to toil on while others think for them and govern them, without even so much as an aspiration for a better condition. The working men of our land make and unmake Presidents, Congresses, and Legislatures, and the elevation of the masses socially, intellectually, and morally is a necessity if you would perpetuate the institutions of the Republic.

Is there a Senator within the sound of my voice who would reduce the laborer of our country to the level of the pauper labor of Europe? No, no! There was once a class of men in these Halls who might have consented to this. Under their "peculiar institution," now happily gone forever, labor was degraded by chains and fetters, and the bold announcement was made that "capital should own its own labor." They resisted unto blood the higher civilization, which taught the sublime truths of the universal brotherhood of man, and the right of all men to the just rewards of their labor.

The conflict is ended, and, God be praised, the right has triumphed; and having thus elevated four million human beings from chains and slavery to freedom and to manhood let us address ourselves to the work of stimulating the industrial energies of the nation, so that free labor shall find its wonted employment, and receive its just reward.

The bill under consideration, if passed, will prove an important agency in this work. It speaks of cottons and woollens, of iron and steel, of wheat and corn, of linseed and barley, but these are only other words for labor, and the title of the bill might with propriety read: "An act for the encouragement and protection of American labor."

Perfect this bill, and then make it a law, and hope and courage will spring up throughout the nation. The fires of a thousand forges and mills and furnaces will illumine the land and the ceaseless hum of a million whirling spindles will chant the praises of the American Congress that had the wisdom to understand and the fidelity to maintain the principles of the American system.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I desire to ask the attention of the Senate to the linen interest as affected by the provisions from page 22 to page 25 of the amended bill reported by the Committee on Finance, section six. I do not intend to make any remarks upon the general provisions of the bill, or upon the proposed tariff as a measure of expediency; nor to go into the questions which have been so ably entered into by my friend, the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. CATTELL.] What I desire to do is simply to state to the Senate the fact that the linen interest is a new branch of industry in this country; that it is directly connected with the agricultural interest in the production of flax and of hemp; that to produce cloth from linen requires three times the labor that is required for the production of cloth from cotton; that the legislation of the country has exhibited its favor to this branch of industry by admitting free of duty the machinery necessary to produce the goods; that in consequence of that favorable legislation large amounts of machinery, hundreds of thousands of dollars in value, have been introduced that will produce every known article manufactured out of linen in any country; but that owing to the present condition of the revenue laws that machinery is found to be of no practical value for the purposes designed.

This subject was brought to the House Committee of Ways and Means at the last session, in June or July, and the facts were laid before the committee by the chairman of the linen interest, and they were induced to adopt a schedule or classification that would meet the necessities of this business. The House adopted provisions satisfactory to this class of people; but the tariff bill has laid over during the interval and is now before us. During the recess an agent, for whose appointment Congress in its wisdom provided, has been at work collecting information as to the various subjects embraced by this bill, and the results of his labors have been laid before Congress. The chairman of the linen interest was induced to go to the custom house where Mr. Wells had located and to have an interview with the person to whom this branch of the tariff had been assigned. That interview was had and appeared to be perfectly satisfactory.

The views expressed and endeavored to be made clear by the chairman of this interest, were, as it was thought, to be adopted by the agent employed by the Government. So the story runs. But upon the report being published it was discovered that a large portion of the classification that had been suggested and ingrafted in the House bill was omitted in the report of the commissioner. Thereupon the gentleman to whom I have alluded, authorized by the linen interest of this country, came to Washington and endeavored to get a hearing before the Senate Committee on Finance during the holidays. Of course the Senate committee were unable to grant time enough to develop the points which he endeavored to make plain, and a written statement was presented which succeeded in obtaining something of a modification of the commissioner's bill, but not sufficient in the opinion of this interest to enable them to go on and to compete with the foreign production and to carry out the idea of promoting the cultivation of flax and hemp in this country with a view to the encouragement of the manufacture and production of all the known articles made from flax. This gentleman then appeared before the Committee on Manufactures of the Senate and laid before them the whole condition of this interest, and that committee has authorized me to ask the favorable consideration of the Senate to the classification which I am authorized to move as a substitute for that which the Committee on Finance have recommended.

I may say here that the chairman of this interest was a farmer who accumulated some property which he devoted in the early stages of this business to the manufacturing of linens and twine; but, sharing the fate of many new enterprises, the capital was sunk and he was induced by solicitations to himself to become an active instrument in endeavoring to bring it out of its depressed and destroyed condition. As a farmer he devoted himself to the production of linen yarns, and I have now the result of his energy, of his skill, and of his application in the production of a yarn equal to any produced in the world, yarn that will produce any fabric that is imported into this country. [Exhibiting skeins of yarn.] It is mainly from his suggestions and from the knowledge which the Committee on Manufactures had themselves as to the condition of this interest, that that committee were induced to suggest the points which I have risen to present to the Senate.

As it takes three times the labor to produce a linen fabric that it does a cotton fabric, and as forty per cent. of the linen material is lost in the process of bleaching, it may be readily understood that if the duties are placed upon the same schedule as to rates as cotton goods it would be unequal. The linen interest should receive a higher protection in point of rate in order to produce equality; but all that is asked by those who represent it and by the Committee on Manufactures is that it should receive the same protection only as that which is given to cotton goods, and they do not ask that it should receive as much as is given to woollens or to silks.

Before I suggest the amendments that I desire to move, let me say that the product of linen is not used as a general thing by the poorer or the working classes of the people. It is used by those whose pockets are able to procure the luxuries of life, and any tax that would be required to promote the growth of flax and hemp in this country, and to develop the linen interest, will come out of the pockets of those who are able to pay the tax.

I come now to consider the bill of the Committee on Finance; and first as to the duty which it imposes on the raw material. The provision is:

On flax, unmanufactured, fifteen dollars per ton.
On flax hackled, known as dressed line, twenty dollars per ton.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The "twenty" dollars has been raised to "thirty."

Mr. SPRAGUE. The chairman of the Finance Committee informs me, however, that the latter clause is raised to thirty dollars. For the purposes of my argument, however, I may consider the bill to stand as it was reported in this respect. Flax, hackled, is a manipulation of flax whereby forty per cent. of the tow is taken therefrom, leaving sixty per cent. of what is called "dressed line." In that condition it is in a manufactured state. The tow of flax or hemp is allowed to be introduced by this bill at five dollars a ton. Forty per cent. of five dollars, which would be the amount of flax or hemp that would come from the dressed line, would introduce the hemp at two dollars a ton. At twenty dollars a ton, sixty per cent. of that only being "dressed line," the duty upon the sixty per cent. would be twelve dollars. Twelve dollars for the sixty per cent. of "dressed line," added to the two dollars upon the flax or hemp, would bring in the "dressed line" at fourteen dollars a ton, taking the bill in this respect as reported by the Committee on Finance. The result would be that "dressed line," which I will observe requires an expense of fifty-six dollars to produce it in that condition in this country, would come in at one dollar per ton less than the unmanufactured article.

Now, I desire to state that in this country there is not a pound of flax used for the finer fabrics at this time that is cultivated in this country. The flax used for the finer fabrics must be pulled before the seed ripens. In all other countries the flax is produced as well for the seed as the fiber. The fiber must be taken when it is in its green state, or before it has grown to a coarse size, and, therefore, all the kind of flax that is imported, either in its unmanufactured or manufactured state, is not at present produced in this country, and cannot be for some years to come.

I ask the Senate whether under these circumstances it would not be wise for them to put unmanufactured flax on the free list, with a view of inducing the manufacturers to consume it; and when they get their machinery in operation there will then be a market for flax, and at the same time the American flax-grower will have some inducement to produce the article. But under the provisions of this bill, as reported by the Committee on Finance, the manufactured flax would be brought in at one dollar per ton less than the unmanufactured, which would do away with all the duty upon it. Not only would this be the result, but the duty would bear very heavily upon the linen interest not yet perfected, not yet in a state to bear any of the burdens that are put upon other articles, because it is new, because the machinery has not yet been put in operation, and because the skill necessary to perfect it has not been concentrated and brought into the country. Now, I ask the Senate to leave off the duty on unmanufactured flax and to leave the duty on the dressed line as it was reported, instead of increasing it to thirty dollars; and that will answer the first conditions that I require. Will the chairman of the Committee on Finance agree to this?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I have no authority to agree to it. It is for the Senate to say.

Mr. SPRAGUE. I will proceed, then, before putting my motion in form to the Senate, to present the various items bearing upon this subject. The bill of the Finance Committee contains this item:

On jute, unmanufactured, and sisal grass, and other vegetable fibers, not otherwise provided for, five dollars per ton.

On all manufactures of sisal grass, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

I think that these articles in the raw state should come in free of duty, for the reason that it would cheapen the price to the consumer and would not interfere with the production, sale, and prices of flax produced in this country; and yet I am not authorized by the Committee on Manufactures to suggest any changes except in the case of manufactures of Sisal grass, in regard to which they think the duty should be forty per cent. instead of thirty per cent., as here provided.

I come next to the duties on cloths made from linen. In the bill as reported by the Finance Committee the heaviest cloths and the finest cloths are placed in the same schedule and under the same classification. If the Senate will refer to that part of the same bill which applies to cloths made from cotton, they will see that they are placed under five different classifications, and the heavier goods bear a different rate of duty from that which is imposed on the finer. In regard to burlaps, canvass paddings, cot bottoms, &c., I desire the same schedule of duties as is provided for cottons, four cents per square yard. Although cottons are at ten per cent. ad valorem and four cents per square yard, I think four cents on these articles would amount to about the same, in consequence of the increased price of cottons, and I will show how that is.

I will take the article of burlaps, worth now in the market twelve and one half cents per yard. Cotton of the same width is worth forty cents a pound. I will put burlaps at the place of importation at eight cents per yard in gold. Thirty-five per cent. on that would make the ad valorem duty $2 80, and four cents per square yard, according to the motion which I intend to make, would make the duty on burlaps $6 80. Now, the duty on cotton goods is fixed at four cents per square yard and ten per cent. ad valorem. Reduce the forty cents that would be required for the manufactured cotton goods of the first class according to this bill, to the gold cost, and it would be about twenty-four cents. Ten per cent. ad valorem duty on that would be $2 40, and then add four cents per square yard, and you would have $6 40 a yard on cotton goods, compared with $6 80, as I propose, for burlaps. In this same bill that provision which applies to gunny-bags and gunny cloths at four cents per pound would be eight cents per square yard in comparison with burlaps at $6 80 per square yard, so that gunny-cloths, the heaviest and the easiest made of any product in the country, has a duty upon it of eight cents per square yard, as compared with $6 80 on burlaps.

The bill of the Finance Committee goes on:

On all brown or bleached linens, ducks, canvas-paddings, cot-bottoms, burlaps, drills, coatings, brown holland, blay linens, Spanish linens, diaper, damasks, crash, huckabacks, handkerchiefs, lawns, or other manufactures of flax, hemp, or jute, or of which flax, hemp, or jute is the component material of chief value, not otherwise provided for, three cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

My proposition is to classify this description of goods the same as cotton goods of like quality, of like weight, but not of like expense of manufacture, because, as I said before, it takes three times the labor to produce linen fabrics that it does cotton fabrics; and there is forty per cent. more shrinkage in the bleached or prepared condition of linens than is the case with cotton goods. Now, in the place of the clause which I have just read, I propose to introduce this:

On all brown or bleached linens, damask table linens, damask brown holland, Spanish linens, blay linens, coatings, drills, diapers, crash, huckabacks, handkerchiefs, lawns, and other manufactures of flax, hemp, or jute, or of which flax, hemp, or jute is the component material of chief value, valued at thirty cents or less per square yard, five cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over thirty cents and not over sixty cents per square yard, ten cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over sixty cents and not over one dollar per square yard, fifteen cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over one dollar per square yard, twenty cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

The ad valorem in my proposition is the same as in that reported by the Committee on Finance, and the five cents per square yard increase according to classification is pretty much the same as is applied to cottons. The highest rate I proposed is twenty cents per square yard and thirty-five per cent. ad valorem as applied to linens, while in the case of silks the ad valorem duty is seventy per cent., nearly twice the amount. A square yard of these finer fabrics would cost in my instance four dollars, a damask table-cloth for instance; so that the specific duty as you reach the higher grades is really the cause of very little increased cost to the consumer.

The next clause in the bill as reported is:

On cordage and rope, of whatever vegetable material composed, three cents per pound.

The Committee on Manufactures have not thought it worth while to disturb that. The next item is as to the duty on gunny-cloth and gunny-bags, to which I have already alluded. The duty on gunny-cloths, as I have said, is one and sixty one-hundredths cent per square yard more than the duty upon the finer fabrics. The next item is:

On jute, hemp, or cocoanut matting and carpeting, three cents per square yard, and, in addition thereto, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

The House bill imposes six and one half cents per square yard, and it may be remembered that carpeting or matting of this character requires a large quantity of hemp or flax made from tow that cannot be produced by the hemp product of this country; and it would seem that as the specific duty is in comparison with the weight of the material very light, the recommendation of the committee there should be adopted.

I come next to the item of thread. The Finance Committee have made two descriptions of thread, one single and one double; and upon each they fix two classifications and distinct duties. The difference between a single yarn and a double yarn is this: in a double yarn there may be two or more yarns twisted together, and a single yarn they reel upon hanks. The expense of twisting and the expense of reeling is about the same, so that the manufacturers have thought that there need not be any different classes of duties applied to threads because the fact really is that there is no difference in expense because the expense of reeling two threads is as much as of twisting two threads together. For that reason the Committee on Manufactures have desired me to suggest this classification:

On threads, patent threads, saddlers' threads, shoe threads, gill-net thread or gill-net twine, pack thread, and sewing machine thread, and all other threads, twines, and yarns, single and when advanced beyond single, made of flax, hemp, or jute, or the tow of flax, hemp, or jute, valued at thirty cents or less per pound, five cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

It will be observed that where five cents per pound is applied to yarns, five cents per square yard is applied to cloth, so that the same method is followed in classifying yarns that was followed in the classification of cloth. The only difference here is that the Finance Committee have made their classification on the basis of the value of fifty cents per pound, whereas the Committee on Manufactures have thought it wise to fix a lower point, and have taken as their classification thirty cents, sixty cents, one dollar, and over one dollar, carrying it out thus:

Valued at over thirty cents and not over sixty cents, ten cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over sixty cents and not over one dollar per pound, fifteen cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over one dollar per pound twenty cents per pound, and thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

The next item is with regard to the seines and nets. In this regard the Committee on Manufactures have adopted nearly the same system in classifying these articles as the Committee on Finance, but when we arrive at the higher values of all these higher classes of yarns we find that on corresponding articles of silk or cotton or wool the duty is from one third to one half more than the corresponding duty on articles of linen manufacture. The proposition of the Committee on Manufactures will be to substitute for the clause of the bill of the Committee on Finance:

On seines or nets made of flax, hemp, or jute thread, yarn, or twine, completed or in parts, valued at not over fifty cents per pound or less, ten cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at fifty cents and not over seventy-five cents per pound, fifteen cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem; valued at over seventy-five cents per pound, twenty cents per pound, and, in addition thereto, thirty-five per cent. ad valorem.

I wish next to call attention to this clause in the bill reported by the Committee on Finance.

On jute yarns, single, thirty per cent. ad valorem.

In every other portion of the bill flax, hemp, and jute yarns are included in a specific classification. Here it is brought down to thirty per cent. ad valorem, but it is already provided for in the previous clauses of the bill, and therefore the Committee on Manufactures recommend that this line be stricken out. The next clause is:

On coir yarn, one cent and a half per pound.

This coir yarn is a substitute for flax and hemp. It may be introduced in the manufacture abroad and mixed, or come unmixed, and would to that extent interfere with the machinery already in operation and ready to produce this article; but, as the Commissioner has observed in his report, it is wise to admit jute and coir with as little burden as possible, because we have in the southern sections of this country land and climate of such a character as would produce them in a very short time if there was a demand for them by the machinery of our own country.

In place of the next clause of the bill of the Committee on Finance, the Committee on Manufactures propose to offer this:

On webbing, tapes, galloons, bindings, gimps, trimmings, braids, plain or otherwise, made of flax, hemp, or jute, or of parts of either, or of which flax, hemp, or jute shall be the component material of chief value, sixty per cent. ad valorem.

Thus raising the duty fixed by the Committee on Finance from fifty per cent. to sixty per cent.; and it will be observed that the rate of ad valorem duty which we propose is about the same as that applied to cottons on page 11. The per cent. of ad valorem duty on cottons is sixty per cent., as will be seen by reference to that page. On page 18 you will see that woollens are put at seventy per cent., and on page 21 silks at forty-five per cent. ad valorem and fifty cents per pound.

The next clause of the bill of the Committee on Finance is:

On all other manufacturers of flax, hemp, or jute, or other similar fiber, not herein otherwise specified, forty per cent. ad valorem.

The Committee on Manufactures recommend that that be fifty per cent.

I think I have gone over the list, and now I desire to say to the Senate that I have examined the subject of the duties on linens carefully as in comparison with those on cottons, and that the Committee on Manufactures have also examined it with care; and although I may not have been able to express myself with sufficient clearness to the Senate, they may be assured that the facts are as I have stated them, and that the classification which the Committee on Manufactures propose bears a close similarity to that of cottons, and is a reduction of one cent per square yard as compared with the duties upon the heavier articles of cottons. The illustration which I have made compares the duties on linen with those on the heavier cottons, but the difference between the suggestions of the Committee on Manufactures and those of the Committee on Finance when applied to the light fabrics and light yarns is not very great. The difference is only in the classification which the Committee on Manufactures propose to introduce with a view to promote this new branch of industry, standing as it does where the cotton manufacture stood twenty years ago. Capital is now at its disposal, ready to enter upon the business so as to be able in a few years to compete successfully with the manufactures of flax and hemp abroad. There is a large amount of this product now imported into this country in consequence of the inability of the American manufacturers to produce it. When it is considered that this country can produce forty millions of flax which may be put into fabrics, and that the stimulus thus given will increase production correspondingly, the flax-grower may readily understand the advantage it is to him to promote this industry and to protect this product.

I desire to state as a matter of fact one other point which I know about myself. Four dollars per week will employ a hand on cottons that will attend to six hundred spindles, whereas it requires seven dollars to attend to one hundred and twenty spindles on linens. And when I say that the introduction of linen machinery that will produce articles as fine, as well manufactured, and as cheap, if you leave out of view the excessive burdens of taxation under which all industry now suffers in this country, has been in consequence of the favor afforded and the inducement held out by the Government in withdrawing the duties from the importation of flax machinery, it may be well understood why the linen manufacturers are in the position they are with this machinery unemployed, and the Senate will understand the necessity, at any rate, for placing their products upon an equal footing with cotton manufactures.

Before I am done I will make a comparison between linen thread and cotton thread. The duty on carpeting is eighty cents per square yard. The carpeting is three fourths of a yard in width or thereabouts. The duty therefore is $1 20 per running yard. The bottom of these carpets is linen thread. That thread is now entered at a nominal duty; it can be purchased abroad at from twelve to fifteen cents. That class of yarns and threads can be produced in this country out of the flax and hemp cultivated here. Under the classification of the bill of the Committee on Finance all that material will be imported from abroad. Now this great interest, the only real interest in this country that is upon its feet, will not in the least be embarrassed by placing the duty upon linens the same as upon cottons; and as regards thread, allow me to call the attention of the Senate to the duty upon spool thread in the classification of the bill reported by the Committee on Finance, and they will see that the duty upon that kind of thread which bears a comparison or analogy to linen thread is two or three times as much.

Mr. CONNESS. With the consent of the Senator from Rhode Island, if he will give way for that purpose, I will move an executive session. It is understood to be desirable to have a short executive session, and as it is now four o'clock I suppose it is about time.

Mr. FESSENDEN. An executive session can be had just as well at five o'clock as now, and we must get through with this bill at some time or other.

Mr. CONNESS. The honorable Senator will have the Senate with him until he passes his bill, but we must do a little else as we go along. I hope he will consent to this. At any rate, I make the motion that the Senate do now proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island will not give way. I wish to say to the Senator from California that I do not have the Senate with me. Every now and then some Senator wants to offer a resolution and asks me to give way to let him do so. I believe the Senator from California has done that twice to-day. I merely wish to remind Senators that this is not the only bill we have got to pass. We have not yet passed a single appropriation bill, and we have but a very short time remaining. If Senators will not allow more than four hours daily for action upon these bills when they come in, we shall not be able to get through our business. The British Parliament sit from four o'clock in the afternoon until midnight or one in the morning.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. HENDRICKS in the chair.) Does the Senator from Rhode Island yield the floor to the Senator from California?

Mr. SPRAGUE. Certainly, I yield the floor.

Mr. CONNESS. I understand the force of the remarks of the honorable Senator from Maine, but I think the Senate is really at his pleasure on these bills; and although he does not like to say it, I will say it for him, he generally has his own way here about time. I think an executive session is needed, and I hope we shall have it now. I insist upon my motion.

The motion was agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 18, noes 11.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 22, 1867.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. C. B. BOXTON.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CLERK OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. KASSON, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on a Uniform System of Coinage, Weights and Measures be authorized to employ a clerk, at the usual rate of compensation, for forty days during the present session.

Mr. KASSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JUDICIAL PROCEEDINGS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill to regulate judicial proceedings in certain cases, and have it referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. FINCK. I ask that the bill may be read.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. As the bill is a long one, and it will take up much time to read it in full, I will not ask leave now to introduce it.

BRANCH OF UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. DONNELLY, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to facilitate the construction of a branch of the Union Pacific railroad from Sioux City to the head of Lake Superior; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Pacific Railroad, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. STEVENS. I ask leave of absence for Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, for the remainder of the session. The condition of his health is such that it is absolutely necessary that he should refrain from attendance here for the balance of the session.

Leave was accordingly granted.

OBSTRUCTION OF MAIL ROUTES.

Mr. PAINE, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill to punish obstructions of railways used for the transportation of the United States mail; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and ordered to be printed.

HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION, ARKANSAS.

Mr. SCHENCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill for the sale of the Hot Springs Reservation, in the State of Arkansas; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Public Lands, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF HON. A. H. COFFROTH.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I rise to a privileged question, and call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which a resolution which I introduced on Saturday last in relation to the compensation of Hon. Alexander H. Coffroth, late a member of this House, was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. I will state very briefly the reasons why I think that vote should be reconsidered.

The Committee on the Judiciary, as is well known to all, is pressed with business more than it can properly attend to for the remainder of the session; and I think there would not be the slightest possibility that we could get a report on that subject from the committee at this session. Nor can I see that there is any legal point involved in this matter which should require an opinion from that committee. I think, after the precedent set by the House upon other occasions in cases which

I think are parallel to this, the House is as prepared to act understandingly upon the subject to-day as at any other time.

The facts in the case are these: Mr. Coffroth, at the commencement of the last session, was admitted by a vote of this House to a seat here as a member of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, the House determining that he had a prima facie right to a seat as a member. His seat was contested, as we all know, and the House finally found for the contestant, and Mr. Coffroth was ousted. Subsequently to that the House, on the last day of the session, passed an act increasing the compensation of members of Congress. The terms of that act, so far as they relate to this case, I will read:

And be it further enacted, That the compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress shall be $5,000 per annum, to be computed from the first day of the present Congress.

Mr. Coffroth had received his pay at the rate of $3,000 a year, that being the compensation allowed by law at the time he was a member. The act to which I have referred related back to the first day of the session; in other words, it included all the time that Mr. Coffroth held a seat here as a member of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. Mr. Coffroth while a member, was entitled to the pay and emoluments of a member of Congress. He stood upon the same footing with every other member on this floor. The fact that he was ousted prior to the passage of the law giving extra compensation should not, it strikes me, affect in any manner the claim of Mr. Coffroth.

But, sir, this House has already set two precedents which seem to me to cover this case. One of these precedents was in the case of Mr. Gooch, who was elected a member of the Thirty-Ninth Congress from the State of Massachusetts, and who resigned previous to the commencement of the first session of the Thirty-Ninth Congress. In that case the House has adopted a resolution granting to Mr. Gooch the increased compensation from the beginning of the Congress up to the time of his resignation. That precedent of itself should, I think, govern the case.

Another instance was that of a member from New York, Mr. Humphrey, who was taken from us by death prior to the passage of the act giving increased compensation. This House has adopted a resolution granting to the family of Mr. Humphrey the increased compensation up to the time of his death. In both these instances the parties had ceased to be members prior to the passage of the act giving the increased compensation. It seems to me that these cases should govern that of Mr. Coffroth. I can see no reason why he is not as much entitled to the extra compensation as we who have received it.

I trust that the motion to reconsider will prevail, and that the resolution will be put upon its passage now. If no gentleman wishes to say anything on the subject I will demand the previous question.

Mr. RAYMOND. With the consent of the gentleman from Missouri I would like to ask a question.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. RAYMOND. Early in this session a bill was introduced to repeal the law of last session giving increased compensation to members of Congress. That bill was referred, I believe, to the Committee on the Judiciary. I would like to inquire of the chairman of that committee [Mr. WILSON, of Iowa] whether the committee propose to take action on that bill, and when they will probably be able to lay it before the House for consideration. I ask this because there are probably quite a large number of members who have not drawn their extra compensation, and who prefer not to do so until they know what is to be the fate of that bill.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I do not see that the question propounded by the gentleman from New York [Mr. RAYMOND] has any pertinency to the subject before the House, nor am I prepared to say, if the Committee on the Judiciary should report back the bill referred to, what would be the action of the House upon it. I presume that, if the bill should be reported to the House, all the members who voted for the increase of pay at the last session would be in favor of its continuance. Hence, I see no occasion for any member permitting the amount of his extra pay to remain longer in the Treasury. Certainly a House of Representatives, which just before the elections for members of Congress had the courage to pass a provision for extra compensation, would not be in haste when the elections are over to repeal that provision of the law and pay back the amount of the extra compensation, as the amendment referred to the committee proposes.

Mr. RAYMOND. I have no objection to the gentleman arguing the probabilities with regard to a vote of the House on the question. I think, however, it might be more satisfactory to the House if the committee would report the bill and let the House act upon it according to its own judgment.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I should like to know whether the gentleman from New York has allowed his extra pay to remain in the Treasury.

Mr. RAYMOND. I have not drawn the extra compensation. I am naturally very anxious to do so, but I do not like to draw it until it is decided whether this repealing bill is to be passed or not. If the gentleman can give me an assurance that it will not be repealed and that I shall not be compelled to pass through the very unpleasant process of paying back the money, I do not know that I should press this inquiry further.

Mr. BLAINE. I cannot see that this question has any bearing upon the case of Mr. Coffroth. It seems to me that the House has fully and entirely adjudicated the whole question involved in this case by granting the extra compensation to Mr. Gooch. As to the matter of refunding the extra pay in case a repealing bill should be passed, I presume that Mr. Coffroth would make repayment as promptly as any of the one hundred and seventy members who have drawn their extra compensation. I see no reason why Mr. Coffroth should be kept out of this extra pay a single day, when the rest of us have pocketed it. I do not see the pertinence of the inquiry made by the gentleman from New York. [Mr. RAYMOND.]

Mr. RAYMOND. I beg to remind the gentleman from Maine that I have made no opposition to the resolution. I did not suppose that my inquiry was pertinent to this particular question. I made it for a different purpose altogether.

Mr. DAWES. I wish to call the attention of the House to the difference in the two cases of Mr. Gooch and Mr. Coffroth. It is not my intention to offer any remarks on the propriety of passing this resolution, but only on the power.

I desire the House shall understand it is not the case of Mr. Gooch, but is fixing a new precedent, which will be followed by all the cases which have been passed upon by the Committee of Elections. The difference between the case of Mr. Coffroth and that of Mr. Gooch is this: Mr. Gooch was a member of this House de jure, actually elected a member of this House, while Mr. Coffroth was never elected a member of this House, and was only a member de facto, and took the pay which the law allowed a member de facto, and that only. Mr. Gooch was actually a member of the House, while Mr. Coffroth was only a member de facto; and, as the result showed, the report of the committee and the decision of the House was that he was not entitled to anything, and only took the pay of a member de facto, which he was entitled to under the law. According to the report of the committee and the decision of the House he received pay which belonged to some one else. He took it, not in his own right, but in his own wrong. I only desire to have it clearly understood that there is this difference in the two cases, and that this case will form a precedent for all cases passed upon by the Committee of Elections.

Mr. BLAINE. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts whether he ever knew of a gentleman who sat here and was afterward unseated by a subsequent decision of the House who was not paid the legal pay for the time he sat as a member. I submit the de facto case is stronger to my mind than the de jure one. Mr. KOONTZ never was a member of the House, was never qualified, never took his seat until the report of the committee and the decision of the House. He was a presumptive member, but never participated in legislation, while Mr. Coffroth was here as a member until he was declared by the House not entitled to a seat. After he has participated as a member of this House, whether he can be deprived of the legal pay of that time, which has been pocketed, I leave to the close logic of the chairman of the Committee of Elections.

Mr. DAWES. It does not depend upon any logic of mine whether he shall have pay or not, but it depends on the correctness of the position of the gentleman from Maine or mine whether the two cases are the same.

The gentleman asks me whether I ever knew of a de facto member who did not draw the pay which a member was entitled to by law while he was sitting here. I answer, no; and that is what Mr. Coffroth did. He as a de facto member drew the pay a legal member was entitled to.

One word more. The gentleman from Maine says to his mind this is a stronger case than that of Mr. KOONTZ. Very well; but it is not the same case. It may be stronger to his mind, because he says Mr. KOONTZ was never a member of this House. I want him to understand that he sat in this House waiting upon the committee for months, the duties of which were protracted by this House; and I speak of this only to show Mr. Gooch was not without merit in claiming this extra pay.

Mr. BLAINE. I suppose not.

Mr. DAWES. I want this put upon the true ground. It is not the same case as that of Mr. Gooch. It is a precedent, standing by itself, and for the first time in the history of contested election cases will a man who sat as a de facto member be adjudged by the House of Representatives entitled to extra pay not prescribed by the law in existence while he sat as a member. If the House is disposed to do it I have not a word to say, only it will be followed by all of the other cases I have mentioned.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to ask the gentleman from Missouri whether this extra pay now claimed by Mr. Coffroth has not been in fact paid to the actual member, Mr. KOONTZ.

Mr. BENJAMIN. In reply to that I will say that not only the extra pay, but the original pay has been received by the successful contestant; and not only in that case, but in every case where a sitting member has been ousted. We always pay both members.

Now, in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts, the question, and the only question is, was Mr. Coffroth entitled to the pay of a member of Congress. It makes no difference whether he is de facto or de jure a member, his pay is the same. That the gentleman admits. There is no difference between us in that respect.

Now, what is the legal pay? Let every gentleman ask himself what pay he is entitled to and from what time that pay commenced. He can readily answer the question. Being entitled to pay at all, he is entitled to all of it; and he might for the same reason say he would never draw any of his pay after receiving the original $3,000 because it did not belong to him; for if he is entitled to any he is entitled to all, the act referring back to the commencement of the Thirty-Ninth Congress.

Mr. SCHENCK. It seems to me this whole matter may be adjusted without difficulty if the gentleman will consent to an amendment of his resolution. I will suggest an amendment to this effect:

Provided, That the said Alexander H. Coffroth shall be entitled in good faith to the same conscientious scruples as other members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress as to receiving any part of said pay, and that he shall refund the same when they do. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. That is not in order at present, the pending question being on the reconsideration of the reference.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I pledge myself that Mr. Coffroth will return the increased pay to the conscience fund whenever other members of this House do it. [Laughter.] I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Will the gentleman from Missouri yield?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I decline to yield any further.

Mr. CONKLING. I desire to have the resolution reported for information.

The resolution was again read.

The question being taken on reconsidering the vote by which the resolution was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, it was reconsidered.

The question being taken on the motion to refer it to that committee, it was disagreed to.

The question recurred on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I demand the previous question.

Mr. SCHENCK. As my amendment is now in order, I ask to be allowed to offer it.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will allow it to be read for information.

The amendment of Mr. SCHENCK was read, as follows:

Provided, That the said Alexander H. Coffroth be entitled in good faith to the same conscientious scruples as other members of the Thirty-Ninth Congress, as to receiving any part of said pay, and that he shall refund the same when they do. [Laughter.]

Several MEMBERS. All right.

Mr. BENJAMIN. As it has gone before the country, I think that will do. I decline to allow it to be offered.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. BROOMALL. I demand the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken; it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 93, nays 39, not voting 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Bromwell, Buckland, Campbell, Chanler, Cooper, Cullom, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farquhar, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Hayes, Hill, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Deems Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Kerr, Koontz, Kuykendall, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Lettwich, Longyear, Marshall, Marvin, McKee, McKuer, Miller, Moorhead, Moulton, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Porham, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Ritter, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Stilwell, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Henry D. Washburn, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, Winfield, and Woodbridge—93.

NAYS—Messrs. Baker, Baxter, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Dawes, Deming, Farnsworth, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Hise, John H. Hubbard, Kelley, Ketcham, Loan, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, Morrill, Morris, Myers, O'Neill, Pike, Raymond, Rollins, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Stevens, Stokes, Trimble, Trowbridge, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, William B. Washburn, and Williams—39.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Bingham, Blow, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Defrees, Delano, Dodge, Dumont, Eckley, Ferry, Finck, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Higby, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Jenckes, Jones, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, Latham, William Lawrence, Maynard, McCullough, M. Indoe, Mercer, Newell, Phelps, Plants, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Rousseau, Starr, Thayer, Upson, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Wright—59.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. BENJAMIN moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF MESSRS. VOORHEES AND BROOKS.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Daniel W. Voorhees the amount of increased pay of a member of this House provided by law, from the commencement of the Thirty-Ninth Congress to the period when he ceased to be a member.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I demand the previous question on the resolution.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I desire to suggest as an amendment that the name of James Brooks be inserted in the resolution.

Mr. DAWES. I was about to ask the gentleman to modify his resolution in that way. We may as well make short work of it and put the name of James Brooks in the resolution.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I will modify the resolution so as to include the name of James Brooks, and now I ask the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Messrs. DAWES and KOONTZ demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FARNSWORTH. Would it be in order to move to amend the resolution so as to include all the contestants who came here to get seats? The same principle would cover them precisely.

The SPEAKER. It could only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 79, nays 43, not voting 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Anderson, James M. Ashley, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bidwell, Blaine, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Campbell, Chandler, Cooper, Dawson, Denison, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Haynes, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Holmes, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Kasson, Kerr, Kuykendall, Ladin, Latham, Le Blond, Longyear, Marshall, Marvin, McIndoe, McRuer, Miller, Moorhead, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Paine, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Schenck, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Spalding, Stillwell, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Francis Thomas, Thornton, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Wentworth, Winfield, and Woodbridge—79.

NAYS—Messrs. Baker, Baxter, Bingham, Broomall, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Dawes, Deming, Eckley, Farnsworth, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Hise, John H. Hubbard, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Loan, Lynch, Marston, Maynard, McClurg, Mercer, Morris, Myers, O'Neill, Perham, Pike, Raymond, Rollins, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Stokes, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, William B. Washburn, and Williams—43.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Blow, Bromwell, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Gullom, Culver, Darling, Davis, Defrees, Delano, Dodge, Dumont, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Jenckes, Jones, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Leftwich, McCullough, McKee, Morrill, Moulton, Orth, Patterson, Phelps, Plants, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rousseau, Sawyer, Starr, Stevens, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Trimble, Upson, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Welker, Whaley, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Wright—69.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. FORNEY, its Secretary, announced that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of House to the bill (S. No. 69) to provide for the payment of pensions, with amendments, in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

CONTESTED ELECTION—THOMAS VS. ARNELL.

Mr. DAWES. I rise to a question of privilege. I call up the resolution reported yesterday by the Committee of Elections in the case of Thomas vs. ARNELL.

Mr. MAYNARD. I hope the gentleman will not call up that case until the report that accompanies the resolution is printed. It certainly would not be doing justice to the parties, and I think it would not be doing justice to the House.

Mr. DAWES. My object is to obtain as early action as possible, knowing how brief the time left is for the parties to prepare their cases. If the parties themselves are not desirous of pressing the matter I have no desire to do it. I think the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MAYNARD] will be able to present to the House the precise question at issue as well without the report as with it.

Mr. MAYNARD. I think it is very unusual for the House to act upon such questions as this without having a printed report before them for their information. It is well known that members rely more upon the facts that are presented in the report than they do even upon the oral argument which may be founded upon those facts. This report I suppose is not very voluminous, and it may be sent in here from the printing office even during the present sitting of the House, certainly before our next sitting. I trust we shall not be called upon to act in this case until we can have the report printed and laid before us. I had supposed that the report would have been printed and laid before us to-day. It certainly will be printed by to-morrow, and one day will not make much difference.

Mr. DAWES. Very well; I am not disposed to press the question, unless I can have the cooperation of members from Tennessee in the matter. I therefore withdraw my call for the present.

HOT SPRINGS RESERVATION—AGAIN.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent at this time to submit for consideration a resolution calling for information which should be sent to the Committee on Public Lands, in connection with a bill which was introduced and referred to that committee this morning. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to communicate to this House all the information to be obtained from the records and files of his Department relative to the condition, occupancy, and area of the Hot Springs Reservation, in Hot Springs county, State of Arkansas.

No objection being made, the resolution was received, considered, and agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The morning hour has now commenced, and reports are in order from the Committee on the Judiciary.

E. R. AND S. W. CLARKE.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, the Committee on the Judiciary were discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill No. 402, to confirm the title of Ethan Ray Clarke and Samuel Ward Clarke to certain lands in the State of Florida, claimed under grant from the Spanish Government; and the same was referred to the Committee on Private Land Claims.

CHARLES CLARKE.

On motion of Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, the Committee on the Judiciary were also discharged from the further consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 146, for the relief of Charles Clarke, marshal of the United States for the district of Maine; and the same was referred to the Committee of Claims.

INDEMNITY FOR OFFICIAL ACTS.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back with sundry amendments House bill No. 859, to declare valid and conclusive certain proclamations of the President, and acts done in pursuance thereof, or of his orders, in the suppression of the late rebellion against the United States, with a recommendation that the same do pass.

The bill was read at length. It provides that all acts, proclamations, and orders of the President of the United States, or acts done by his authority or approval after the 4th of March, 1861, and before the 1st day of December, 1865, respecting martial law, military trials by courts-martial or military commissions, or the arrest, imprisonment, and trial of persons charged with participation in the late rebellion against the United States, or as aiders or abettors thereof, or as guilty of any disloyal practice in aid thereof, or of affording aid and comfort to rebels against the authority of the United States, and all proceedings and acts done or had by courts-martial or military commissions, or arrests and imprisonments made in the premises by any person by the authority of the orders or proclamations of the President, made as aforesaid, are hereby approved in all respects, legalized, and made valid, to the same extent and with the same effect as if said orders and proclamations had been issued and made, and said arrests, imprisonments, proceedings, and acts had been done under the previous express authority and direction of the Congress of the United States, and in pursuance of a law thereof previously enacted and expressly authorizing and directing the same to be done. And no civil court of the United States, or of any State, or of any District or Territory of the United States, shall have or take jurisdiction of, or in any manner reverse any of the proceedings had or acts done as aforesaid, nor shall any person be held to answer in any of said courts for any act done or omitted to be done in pursuance of any of said proclamations or orders, or by authority or with the approval of the President within the period aforesaid, and respecting any of the matters aforesaid; and all acts and parts of acts heretofore passed, and inconsistent with the provisions of this act, are hereby repealed.

The first amendment reported by the committee was to insert after the words "or as guilty of any disloyal practice in aid thereof" the words "or of any violation of the laws or usages of war."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert after the words "and no civil court of the United States or of any State" the words "or of the District of Columbia."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to insert near the close of the bill, after the words "and respecting any of the matters aforesaid," the following:

And all officers and other persons in the service of the United States, acting in the premises, shall be held prima facie to have been authorized by the President.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman from Iowa yield to me for a moment?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, it strikes me that this bill goes very far; but we go to an extreme and an unprecedented length when we undertake to adopt a provision such as that proposed in the amendment. It proposes to enact that any officer of the United States, when called to answer for wrongful acts committed by him, shall be held prima facie to have received authority for such acts. Sir, I think we had better let things take the ordinary course. If provost marshals of the United States have without legal authority imprisoned men, willfully locked them up from mere caprice or malice, why not let such cases take the regular course of the law? Why should this Congress undertake to declare that, because men held appointments under the United States, it shall be presumed prima facie that all their acts were done under the direct authority of the Secretary of War and the President? It is reversing the proper order of things and requiring a party to prove a negative.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, it is the purpose of the committee to provide in this bill a complete indemnity for persons who have acted for the United States in connection with the various subject-matters mentioned in the provisions of the bill. It is for the purpose of making this indemnity effectual that I have proposed the pending amendment. I now demand the previous question on the amendment.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 199, nays 37, not voting 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Dawes, Deacons, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Kuykendall, Laffin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spaulding, Stevens, Stillwell, Stokes, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—109.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Campbell, Chanter, Cooper, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, Hise, Edwin N. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Kerr, Le Blond, Lettwich, Marshall, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Nelson Taylor, Thornton, and Trimble—37.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Ames, Ames, Arnell, Banks, Blaine, Blow, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dodge, Hale, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Hogan, Asahel W. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jones, Kasson, William Lawrence, Maynard, McCullough, Morrill, Patterson, Phelps, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, John L. Rice, Rousseau, Sawyer, Starr, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Wright—45.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would ask the gentleman from Iowa whether he has any other amendments to offer to the bill?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I have not.

Mr. LE BLOND. I would ask the gentleman what course he intends to pursue in regard to the bill—whether he intends to put it upon its passage now.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is my purpose to put that bill upon its passage.

Mr. LE BLOND. At this time, and without debate?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Of course if I put it upon its passage now it will be without debate.

Mr. LE BLOND. Well, I did suppose the gentleman would allow at least a few minutes debate upon this proposition. I should like to say something myself if the gentleman will permit me.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I should be very glad to permit the discussion of this bill if it were possible for me to do so without interfering with the other business of the committee.

Mr. LE BLOND. Oh, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me, the Constitution is paramount to any other business that is pending, and some little debate ought to be given to it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, this committee has not been called for several weeks, and probably will not be called again during this session. A great deal of the important business is in the hands of that committee, and several members desire to submit their reports for the action of the House; therefore it will be impossible for me to consume the morning hour of the day in the discussion of this measure without depriving the committee of an opportunity to report their important bills.

Mr. DELANO. Allow me to make a suggestion. Perhaps the House may consent to put this measure in a position where it will receive some little consideration. It is undoubtedly an important measure, rendered necessary by the decision of the Supreme Court recently made, which decision I think would be properly reviewed and considered in the discussion of this measure.

I look upon the measure as one of vast importance to the nation. It involves really the nation's power for its own protection; and in view of its importance I think it would be well for the country that the House should consider it. I want to know whether the power of this nation for its own preservation lies at the power of any one man. I think it is time the country should know it, and indirectly as this whole subject is embraced in the bill, I suggest whether, as this measure cannot now be discussed, it should not be put in a shape where it can receive the consideration which it deserves. I myself think it is a subject which the House should consider early and settle in such manner as to show its disapprobation to the decision of the Supreme Court which has rendered this bill a necessity.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to say, sir, I sympathize with the views expressed by the gentleman from Ohio. I regret the necessity of asking the House to pass upon this bill without deliberate consideration, and if I can be relieved of this necessity, by order of the House, that it will not lead to undue postponement of this measure I shall be glad to be so relieved. If an early day can be fixed for the discussion of this as a special order, to be continued from day to day until disposed of, I shall not object to that order being made by the House.

The subject embraced in this bill is one of more importance than any other that has been presented to the House during this or any other Congress since the foundation of the Government. It involves all of the questions embraced in the recent decision of the Supreme Court in the Milligan case. It proposes to bring the legislative department of the Government in conflict with the views of that court as expressed by the majority. But I do not think the measure should be crowded through the House with unseemly haste; and if such proposition can be made as I have suggested, I will be thankful to the House for making it.

Mr. DELANO. What will you consent to?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I must first ask the Chair what day we can fix.

The SPEAKER. In response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Iowa, the Chair would state that there are already five special orders in the House undisposed of; namely: the bills in regard to appointments to and removals from office; in regard to counting illegal electoral votes at a presidential election; from the Judiciary Committee, amendatory of the currency law; from the Committee on Banking and Currency, amendatory of the same law, and a railroad grant at Puget sound. There are also five special orders undisposed of in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; namely, the following appropriation bills: invalid pensions, consular and diplomatic, Military Academy, Post Office, and fortifications. The Committee on Appropriations have also yet to report the Army and Navy appropriation bills, and for sundry civil expenses, which will be special orders in the Committee of the Whole. And the Committee of Ways and Means will also probably report a bill amendatory of the internal revenue act.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, with leave to report at any time; that will take it out of the morning hour and allow it to be freely and fairly considered.

Mr. SCHENCK. You will give at least one day's notice.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. GARFIELD. I ask whether the bill as it now stands legalizes the release of rebel property. It seems to me, at a hasty glance, it does more than the gentleman would like. I do not want to legalize the action of a large number of persons during the last two years, merely for the sake of indemnifying some of our friends who ought to be indemnified.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is not the purpose of the committee to go beyond the class of cases named by the decision of the Supreme Court in the Milligan case. I do not think it goes beyond that. It is not the purpose of the committee to ratify any proceeding on the part of the President to which the gentleman refers. We do not enter on that at all.

Mr. ROGERS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROGERS. I am a member of this committee, and it has more business before it than any committee of this House. I am the only member of it, I suppose, who is opposed to this bill. It appears to be the practice of the committee to run these bills through without allowing an opportunity for even a member of the committee to be heard. It is almost useless for me to act upon them in the committee, for I am not heard at all. I must say, however, that I disagree with them in all these bills of a revolutionary character which the committee are getting up.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Unless the gentleman objects to the proposition I am not disposed to yield for a lecture by him.

Mr. ROGERS. I am objecting.

The question was taken; and the bill was recommitted to the committee and ordered to be printed, with authority to report at any time on giving one day's notice.

OATH FOR ATTORNEYS, ETC.

Mr. BOUTWELL, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported back House bill No. 239, to prescribe an oath for public officers and members of the bar, and for other purposes, with an amendment in the nature of a substitute therefor, by striking out all after the enacting clause and inserting the following:

That no person shall be permitted to act as an attorney or counselor in any court of the United States who has been guilty of treason, bribery, murder, or other felony, or who has been engaged in any rebellion against the Government of the United States, or who has given aid, comfort, or encouragement to the enemies of the United States in armed hostility thereto.

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the first section of this act is hereby declared to be a rule of every court of the United States.

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be the duty of the judge or judges of any such court, when the suggestion is made in open court that any person acting as an attorney or counselor of said court, or offering or proposing to so act, is barred by the provisions of this act, or whenever said judge or judges shall believe that such person is so barred, to inquire and ascertain whether such person has been guilty of treason, bribery, murder, or other felony, or whether he has been engaged in any rebellion against the Government of the United States, or whether he has given aid, comfort, or encouragement to the enemies of the United States in armed hostility thereto; and if the court shall be of opinion that such person has been guilty of treason, bribery, murder, or other felony, or that he has been engaged in any rebellion against the Government of the United States, or that he has given aid, comfort, or encouragement to the enemies of the United States in armed hostility thereto, to exclude or debar such person from the office of attorney or counselor of said court; and any person who shall testify falsely in any examination made by any court as aforesaid shall be guilty of perjury, and liable to the pains and penalties of perjury.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker; as the amended bill has been read by the Clerk I shall be saved the necessity of much explanation. It is very well known that the majority of the Supreme Court have declared the test oath unconstitutional so far as by act of Congress the attempt was made to apply it to counselors and attorneys in the courts of the United States. The purpose of this bill is to declare by a rule, which, I take it, under the Constitution and by the decisions of the courts of the United States, it is entirely competent for the legislative department of the Government to declare, that certain persons shall not hold the office of attorney or counselor in any court of the United States. It provides that persons who are guilty of certain offenses shall be debarred from that office in all of the courts of the United States.

We believe, as a committee, that it is entirely competent for Congress to declare, not only what the rules of the Supreme Court shall be in reference to this particular class of cases, but in reference to every case which can possibly arise in the judicial administration of the law. Congress, by the Constitution, has power to enact all laws necessary and proper for the administration of the executive and judicial departments of the Government, and nothing can be more eminently proper than that persons who have been guilty, as in this bill it is declared, of treason, bribery, murder, or other felony, or who have participated in any rebellion against the Government of the United States, or have given aid, comfort, counsel, or encouragement to the enemies of the United States in armed hostility thereto, should be deprived of the privilege of appearing as officers of the Government in any court of the United States.

It is no punishment. The opinion of the court that persons are guilty of any of the offenses enumerated in this bill is no evidence elsewhere by which those persons are to be deprived of any right whatever. It does not even deprive them of the power of practicing in the vocation of attorneys or counselors, but merely says that those persons are of such character and such known repute, based upon the actual facts of their lives, that they are unworthy to appear in the judicial tribunals of the country, to come in contact with the officers of the law, to exercise an influence over the Chief Magistrates of the land deleterious to the public morals; and if there be five judges upon the bench of the highest tribunal who have not that respect for themselves to enact rules and to enforce proper regulations by which they will protect themselves from the foul contamination of conspirators and traitors against the Government of this country, then the time has already arrived when the legislative department of the Government should exercise its power to declare who shall be officers of the Government in the administration of the law in the courts of the Union; and this bill is for that purpose. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report this bill, and I ask the previous question upon it.

Mr. CHANLER. I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will not force this question directly upon the House without allowing some opportunity to this side of the House to speak in behalf, not of the rebellion, but of the Supreme Court of the United States. Will the gentleman allow me a few moments before he presses the previous question?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I will yield to the gentleman from New York for five minutes.

Mr. CHANLER. I thank the gentleman for his extensive courtesy. But, sir, by this bill the whole issue upon this floor is changed. It is not now a question of rebellion against the Government of the United States sustained by the Opposition upon this side of the House, as is so often charged by the Administration party; but we are arrayed here and called upon to sustain the character of the Supreme Court of the United States from the assaults of the devil's advocate from Massachusetts. When, sir, a Christian was to be admitted into the calendar of saints the college of cardinals sat in judgment upon the coming brother, and one of them, arrayed in all the panoply of his office, assuming the position of devil's advocate, accuses the unheard and unseen person of every crime known to the catalogue of sins.

Mr. SPALDING. I call the gentleman from New York to order. He has called the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] "the devil's advocate." [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must repeat the words excepted to, and the Chair will then rule upon them.

Mr. SPALDING. The Globe reporters will furnish them; they have taken them down.

Mr. STEVENS. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will not detain the House, but will withdraw his point of order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. CHANLER] did not say a word; every one agrees to that. [Laughter.]

Mr. SPALDING. Well, I will withdraw the point of order.

Mr. CHANLER. I must ask the gentleman from Massachusetts to extend my five minutes.

He knows very well that the allusion I made had no personal reference to him as an individual, and that my remark was simply in regard to the system of legislation followed here, illustrated by that once adopted in the conclave of cardinals. In placing upon him the liveliness of the "father of lies" I do not say that he is the "father of lies." I simply say that historically he appears on this floor in the same character that the cardinal of Rome assumed when he arrayed himself against a candidate to be admitted to the calendar of saints when, assuming the position of the devil's advocate, he charges the candidate for admission with every crime known to the catalogue of sins.

Now, to start from that point, I assume that the Supreme Court of the United States stands too high to be arraigned upon questions of individual character, because the gentleman himself said, as I understood him, in assailing that institution, that it was a question of character. I claim that I was not out of order in alluding historically to the position of the gentleman, and that he was out of order, under the rules of the House, in assailing one of the coordinate branches of this Government upon the sacred question of character.

Five minutes is not time enough to defend the character of the Supreme Court. [Laughter.] I take it, sir, that when a defense of the Supreme Court is necessary upon this floor it will be more than a five-minutes question; and if there is any argument deeper, broader, and more damning against the organization of this House it is that a man will rise here to assail the Supreme Court, and when asked to yield that that institution may be defended he shuts off debate under a five-minutes rule. I leave the gentleman in his unenviable position. Let him go on and defend those whom he thinks to be right and I will defend those whom I deem to be right.

Here the hammer fell.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would perhaps yield further to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CHANLER,] but I think that probably the Supreme Court of the United States will be satisfied with the defense he has already made of that body.

Mr. CHANLER. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.]

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now yield for eight minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS.]

Mr. ROGERS. I am truly sorry that a committee of this House should consider it right and proper to urge through questions of so grave and momentous importance as this without allowing anybody upon this side of the House to be heard. I say that the only essence of liberty in this country is in having the people heard through their representatives upon the floor of Congress. And every man who has any regard for the right of free speech must see that we upon this side of the House are not allowed—and I say it with all due courtesy to gentlemen upon the other side of the House—that right to express our sentiments in behalf of two millions of voters in this country which we ought to be allowed. No one can expect that a question involving constitutional principles as this does, one that strikes at the very foundation of our judicial system, that attempts to inaugurate this Congress into a judicial body or legislative court, can be fully discussed in the short, paltry time of eight minutes.

This bill undertakes to override the plain principles laid down in the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of ex parte Garland, where the test oath was declared to be unconstitutional upon the plain and simple ground that it inflicted a punishment for past offenses which did not attach to them at the time of their commission. The very object of this bill is to deprive persons of the right and privilege of acting as attorneys and counselors in the courts of the United States simply because they were engaged in the rebellion; thus attaching to that offense a punishment which did not attach to it at the time of its commission. It also authorizes and allows judges of the courts to condemn, without trial before a jury, attorneys and counselors who make application to be admitted to practice as guilty of treason and other high crimes named in the bill which has been presented for the consideration of this House.

I deny the authority of this Congress, or of any other body known to the Constitution of this country, to deprive a citizen of the United States, where his character, his life, his property, and his reputation are concerned, of his right to be tried by the tribunal guaranteed to him by the Constitution, a jury of twelve men, to be impaneled to consider and try his case according to the law.

This bill mistakes the Constitution in two very material particulars. One is, that it inflicts an additional punishment for an offense that was not provided for at the time it was committed. The other is, that it organizes a system of trial unknown to the courts of this country; and it establishes a judicial system through Congress which alone ought to be and can only be constitutionally exercised by the courts of judicature.

Sir, an attorney or counselor is not an officer of the Government, nor is he a State officer. He is a mere deputy or agent appointed by a court for the purpose of carrying on the necessary functions and powers which have been lodged in that court by virtue of the Constitution of the United States. From time immemorial, from the earliest days of the common law in England down through the whole history of jurisprudence in this country, attorneys and counselors have been appointed and commissioned by the courts, holding their offices during good behavior, and forfeiting them by any act of misbehavior in the court. And if a man is not of good moral character, or has been guilty of any of the offenses named in this bill, when he has been tried by a tribunal competent to try the case, and has been found guilty, he will be removed by the court.

If men of character and standing are to be placed in jeopardy in this manner, are to be tried without the benefit of a jury, then I will say that liberty in this country has flown from the luminous sphere which she has heretofore occupied in the courts; and nothing but despotism exercised by Congress is to be the rule of action. And this outrage is to be inflicted upon every man who cannot come up to the test of loyalty laid down and prescribed by the members of this honorable body. And I appeal to members upon the other side of the House that out of regard to the dignity of the Congress of the United States, and the rights of the freemen of this land, measures of such momentous consequence should not be rushed through the House in this manner without allowing to gentlemen who oppose them any opportunity to state the reasons of their opposition.

Sir, I will not undertake in the short time allotted to me to discuss the constitutional questions involved in this matter. Those questions have been fully examined in the decision of the Supreme Court in the case of ex parte Garland; and any member of the House who may read that decision, if he has any regard whatever for the supreme law of the land as enunciated by that tribunal, cannot hesitate to say that there is no authority lodged in this Congress to do directly what we were unable to do indirectly by the passage of the test oath act, which inflicted this punishment in an indirect manner upon those who had been engaged in the rebellion.

Sir, this bill is objectionable, not only because it exceeds our constitutional authority; it is injudicious in point of policy. We must practice the principles of charity. Christianity must rule in this country. The laws of God must govern men's consciences. To undertake now to inflict punishment upon men in this manner by depriving them of the means of earning a livelihood by practicing law in the courts of justice, after they have received a full pardon for any offenses they may have committed, must engender a spirit of animosity and revenge which years will not be able to wipe out.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KELLEY. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the House shall sustain the call for the previous question, I will yield to other gentlemen a large part of the hour to which I shall be entitled. I do not intend to occupy much time myself. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] is now entitled to an hour to close the debate.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE. Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult to judge of the merits of an important measure like this from the mere reading by the Clerk at the desk. The bill has not been printed and laid before us. I endeavored to follow the reading as closely as I could; but I am satisfied that I failed to understand properly several important provisions of the bill. I apprehended as the bill was read that it applied to State courts as well as Federal courts. I wish to inquire whether I am correct on that point?

Mr. BOUTWELL. The bill applies only to the courts of the United States; it does not interfere with the practice of the State courts.

Mr. HALE. I shall not attempt, Mr. Speaker, to discuss to any extent the constitutional questions involved in this bill. While I have no sympathy with any feeling that prompts members upon this floor to attack the Supreme Court as guilty of corrupt or improper action, I have, on the other hand, no disposition to support any legislation which would tend to do away with the test oath, so far as it can be constitutionally upheld, and so far as it is applicable to what are considered, in popular estimation, offices. But I have long been of opinion that the test oath act covers a class of nominal offices, like the offices of attorneys and counselors in courts, in regard to which it would be the part of wisdom to repeal the requirement of the oath, even if it were held to be within the constitutional power of this Congress to impose it. I ask gentlemen whether there is any good reason as a matter of policy why we should insist on applying this exclusion as for past acts to those offices which are such only nominally, while they are in fact the exercise of a profession or employment as completely as the practice of any other of the learned professions or any of the mechanic arts. It seems to me that for us now to pursue the course contemplated by this bill, and to exclude for an indefinite time—I do not think any member of this House is inclined to hold that the exclusion should be adhered to perpetually—to exclude for an indefinite period attorneys and counselors on account of past acts, whether pardoned or unpardoned, from the practice of their profession is not the part of wisdom, and does not comport with the judicious policy which Congress ought to pursue toward those lately engaged in rebellion.

Now, I concede, for the purpose of argument, that attorneys and counselors of courts may be considered in one sense officers of the Government, though independently of my argument I might perhaps question that. They are undoubtedly officers of the courts. They may perhaps be considered officers of the Government; but it is purely in a technical sense that they are officers. They are considered officers to enable the court to control them; to exercise summary jurisdiction over them as they do over other officers of the court.

In reality it is a profession by which a man gets his living, by which he earns his bread; and is it the part of wisdom, is it a policy such as shall commend itself to us, we shall now go back and say, notwithstanding any circumstances which may surround the case, notwithstanding any pardon, notwithstanding any repentance, notwithstanding anything which should commend the man to our favorable consideration, we shall show no mercy; and because a man has once sinned we will say he has sinned away the day of grace, and the bread shall be taken from his own and his children's mouths?

It seems to me we will be better engaged in pursuing another policy; and great as is my respect for the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] and the Committee on the Judiciary, from which this bill is reported, I am constrained to differ on this question of policy.

There are other questions involved of greater importance than this; questions of un-constitutional power, which I do not assume to discuss, and which cannot be discussed in this brief time. I trust the House will not, under the pressure of the previous question, pass this bill, but take some action that will give an opportunity for discussion and consideration.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now yield to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. JOHNSON. I appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts to allow me three minutes. If it be not granted I shall object to the gentleman farming out the floor.

The SPEAKER. It has been decided more than once that under the rule a gentleman holding the floor may yield for explanation.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. As a question of policy each member will judge and act for himself; and that question I do not propose to discuss. I think, Mr. Speaker, the gentleman has not been happy in drawing his parallel between attorneys and counselors at law, who are officers of the court, and persons engaged in the mechanic arts. It is well known that in all courts of the land the power has been exercised to disbar members of the legal profession, prohibiting them from practicing in the courts for improper or criminal conduct; as, for instance, if an attorney has willfully misled the court or been untrue to his client. Any act of that character is deemed sufficient to disbar the attorney and render him incompetent to practice as an attorney. I have never heard in this country that a mechanic, who may have even willfully done a bad piece of work, can be prevented from following his trade.

Mr. HALE. I concede they are officers of the court for the purpose of submitting them to this summary process.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then that question is out of the case.

Now, how can this bill, if it becomes a law, be enforced? I have heard among members that that court cannot be authorized by Congress to try a man in this summary way for treason or any other offense. Sir, this bill does not propose to clothe the court with any such power. If a member of the bar of the Supreme Court of the United States should be charged with being guilty of any crime, such as murder, the record of his conviction is sufficient proof. So it is in reference to treason or any other grade of felony.

Mr. DAWES. I should like to ask the gentleman from Iowa whether the statutes of every State do not prescribe as one of the qualifications for admission to the bar the possession of a good moral character, and whether it is not for the court to pass on that; and how does this differ from the requirements in State courts.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I cannot see any distinction between the rule which this bill seeks to prescribe and that prescribed by the State laws.

Mr. ROGERS. I would ask the gentleman what construction he puts upon this part of the decision in the case of ex parte Garland:

"The attorney and counselor, being by the solemn judicial act of the court clothed with office, does not hold it as a matter of grace and favor. The right which it confers upon him to appear for suitors and to argue cases is something more than a mere indulgence, revocable at the pleasure of the court or at the command of the Legislature. It is a right of which he can only be deprived by the judgment of the court for moral or professional delinquency."

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I am free to say, in reply to the gentleman, that I can find a great deal in that opinion of the Supreme Court that I do not agree with.

Mr. FINCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. For a question.

Mr. FINCK. The gentleman from Massachusetts inquired of the gentleman from Iowa whether the States did not require as a qualification for the admission of attorneys to practice in the State courts that the applicant should be a man of good moral character, and the gentleman replied that he believed such were the provisions of the laws of the States, and that he could not see any difference between that and the proposed legislation here. I ask the gentleman if he would be willing to put in this bill a provision that the applicant should be a man of good moral character, and let the courts decide the question.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I mean to say that I see no difference in the principle involved. I do not mean to say that the phraseology of this bill is precisely that which is to be found in the State statutes. I am talking about the principle involved. And I wish to say here, so far as the Supreme Court affirms in that decision the power to debar a man for the delinquencies which are there mentioned, I do not differ from it. It is because it stopped short of the application of the principle which I deem to be just and right that I say I differ with the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court has decided, also, the question of the power of the President of the United States to pardon a citizen before or after conviction of any offense he may have committed against the law. Now, if it be said that under the provisions of this bill, which declares that a person who has been engaged in rebellion may be debarred from holding the office of attorney-at-law, I beg gentlemen to remember that a very large class of cases covered by this bill have the record-proof of guilt in the pardon of the President of the United States. If before conviction the President has the power to pardon them, the very application of a person so pardoned is an admission of guilt as surely as would be a plea of guilty in open court.

There are other limitations in the statutes of the several States, those which were referred to by the Supreme Court in that part of the decision read by the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS.] One I may mention is the requirement that the party applying for admission to the bar shall swear he has not been engaged in the practice of dueling, has not been a party to a duel either as principal or second. We are seeking by this bill simply to enforce upon a court where we find a majority unwilling to carry out the laws of Congress a power which we have a right to enforce, and which has never before been questioned—the power to establish rules. The Supreme Court, in the Garland case, undertook to decide that that court possesses the power to prescribe the rules which are to govern it, and that Congress has no right to interfere. And yet any gentleman who will take the time and pains necessary to an examination of the various judiciary acts of the United States will find that there is nothing in the power of the court in that regard that does not depend upon the statutes enacted by Congress. The statutes declare that the courts may prescribe rules. This is the declaration of Congress. Now, sir, if Congress can clothe the courts with power to prescribe rules, why may not the same body prescribe rules itself? If it can do it indirectly through the court, why may it not do it directly through a statute? And that is all the committee propose to do in this bill.

Mr. FINCK. I desire to ask my friend from Iowa whether this proposed legislation is not retroactive in its operation; whether it will not have the effect of disbarring gentlemen who are now practicing law in the Supreme Court from the exercise of that right?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will answer the gentleman's question by asking another. Suppose the statute of Ohio should provide, as I believe it does, that no person who does not possess a good moral character shall be permitted to practice law in that State; and upon examination a party should be admitted to practice under this rule; and we all know these examinations are very loosely conducted sometimes, and after being admitted it should be discovered by the court that instead of being possessed of a good moral character the character of the party was infamous, does the gentleman say the court could not lawfully exclude him from the bar?

Mr. FINCK. I will answer the question as briefly as I can. In that case the court would find, before they would debar the party from practicing, that he was a man of bad character; but in this case of Garland the case has been already examined by the Supreme Court and he has been allowed to practice in that court, and you propose now to require the Supreme Court to go behind that decision and say that Garland is not qualified to practice. I claim that that is a retroactive law.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Of course it would be retroactive, and I take it that we have the power to make it retroactive. It is simply a rule of the court that persons who have been guilty of these offenses shall not appear in the presence of the court as its officers. The object is to defend the court against the presence of such persons, to exclude criminals and infamous persons from the halls of justice; and I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio whether any inquiry into the reputation and character of a party is not necessarily retroactive?

Mr. SPALDING. Always so.

Mr. FINCK. Certainly not.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Can you try a man's character and reputation in the future? I suppose that a man's character is that which he is, regardless of the opinions of others, and that reputation is the judgment of the community in which he resides.

Mr. FINCK. I claim that the question of character, where it is involved, must be determined by its standard at the time of inquiry, and not what it was years before. What is it now? is the inquiry.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. A man's reputation must be based upon his conduct and what others say of him. A man's character is that which he himself is, regardless of the judgment of those surrounding him, and an inquiry into either must necessarily be retroactive. I now resign the floor to the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Mr. Speaker, if the House will pardon me, I think that by the record I can demonstrate concisely how Congress is justified in this proceeding. The gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. ROGERS] was pleased to say that this bill contemplates a new mode of trial. I take it that no gentleman knows better than the gentleman from New Jersey that the provisions of this bill with reference to an examination into the character of a counselor in a court are in exact accordance with the practice in every court in this country and in Great Britain also, as I understand. If it be suggested in open court that a man has been guilty in any time past of any act which unfits him, either according to law or in the judgment of the court, to pursue his profession and hold office as a practitioner in the court, the court proceeds to inquire whether those things are so or not, not as a criminal is charged upon the criminal side of the court, but merely for the purpose of reaching an opinion which has only this effect, that it determines the future standing of the party in court, but does not affect the party anywhere else in his rights.

Mr. ROGERS. I desire to ask the gentleman what is the best proof that a man is guilty of the offenses referred to in this bill, treason, murder, &c.? Can you prove it in any way except by the production of a record of his conviction?

Mr. BOUTWELL. Undoubtedly the production of the record of conviction is the best evidence of the guilt of the party; but that is not the only evidence that a court may take. It may go into an examination of charges which have never been brought before a criminal tribunal, and if the court is convinced that the party is guilty it has a right to deprive him of the privilege of practicing in the court.

Mr. MAYNARD. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts whether this bill amounts to anything more than a statute declaratory of what the law now is? Every court has a right to inquire into the character of its officers; this House might inquire into the conduct of any one of its members, or of its Clerk, or Sergeant-at-Arms, or Doorkeeper, and, being satisfied of his guilt of the charges brought against him, might get him aside. I would ask if this is anything more than the embodying in a statute of what the common law of the courts now is?

Mr. BOUTWELL. There can be no doubt upon that point. And I say here, upon my responsibility, with reference to the recent decision of the Supreme Court, that it is an offense to the dignity and the respectability of the nation that that tribunal, under the general authority vested in it under the Constitution and the laws, does not protect itself from the contamination of rebels and traitors, until the rebellion itself shall be suppressed and those men shall be restored to their former rights as citizens of this country. The Supreme Court, failing in the performance of this high and self-protecting duty, the time has arrived when the Congress of the United States, by whose breath alone the Supreme Court enacts rules of any sort or admits any man to the office of counselor or attorney at its bar, should assume exact and specific authority to declare by solemn law that men who have been guilty of murder or treason or bribery, or who have raised their arms to strike down the Government of their country, shall not participate in the administration of the laws of the land until they are absolved from their crimes.

Now, it is not enough that the Supreme Court of this country tells us that the pardon of the President absolves these men from their iniquities. Sir, that is not enough; the pardon of the President may open the doors of jails and penitentiaries; it may release criminals who are guilty of murder or any other felony. But while I occupy a place upon this floor never with my consent shall the pardon of the President be a certificate on which a felon may enter into the sacred tribunals of this land and assist in the administration of justice. [Applause on the floor and in the galleries.]

The SPEAKER. Spectators in the galleries must not manifest disapprobation or applause; and the assistant doorkeepers of the House will remove all persons offending against its rules.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would inquire of the Chair if it is not equally out of order for members on the floor to applaud.

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I now ask for a vote.

Mr. JOHNSON. Will the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] allow me two minutes upon this question?

Mr. BOUTWELL. There are twenty gentlemen appealing to me to yield, and if I yield to one I ought to yield to all. I must decline to yield further, though I would be glad to accommodate my friend from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JOHNSON.]

Mr. ROGERS. I move to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered to be now put; and upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. FINCK. Upon that motion I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 111, nays 40, not voting 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Gobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Dawes, Deming, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Ketcham, Koontz, Kuykendall, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercur, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spaulding, Stevens, Stokes, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—111.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Campbell, Chanler, Cooper, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hise, Hogan, Edwin N. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Kerr, Latham, Le Blond, Leftwich, Marshall, Nicholson, Neill, Radford, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Stitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, and Winfield—40.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, Banks, Blow, Bromwell, Buckland, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, DeFree, Delano, Dodge, Garfield, Harris, Hart, Hawkins, Henderson, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Jencks, Jones, Kelso, William Lawrence, McCullough, Niblack, Phelps, Pomeroy, Samuel J. Randall, Rousseau, Starr, Stillwell, Thayer, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, and Wright—40.

So the motion to reconsider was laid upon the table.

The question recurring on agreeing to the substitute, it was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read the third time.

Mr. NIBLACK. I call for the reading of the engrossed bill.

The SPEAKER. It has not yet been engrossed.

Mr. MAYNARD. In order to give time for the engrossment of the bill I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROLLINS. I move that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table; and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MAYNARD. That will accomplish the same purpose.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 108, nays 41, not voting 42; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Dawes, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Kuykendall, Laffin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercur, Miller, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Sloan, Spaulding, Stevens, Stokes, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Woodbridge—108.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Campbell, Chanler, Cooper, Dawson, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hise, Hogan, Hunter, Le Blond, Leftwich, Marshall, Maynard, Niblack, Nicholson, Neill, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Stitgreaves, Stillwell, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, and Winfield—41.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, Banks, Blow, Buckland, Sidney Clarke, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Davis, DeFree, Dumont, Eggleston, Grinnell, Harris, Hart, Hawkins, Henderson, Asahel W. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbard, Humphrey, Jencks, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, William Lawrence, Lynch, McCullough, Moorhead, Phelps, Pomeroy, Raymond, Rousseau, Starr, Thayer, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, and Wright—42.

So the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to a third reading was laid on the table.

The engrossed bill was then read.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I call for the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. FINCK. I move that the House adjourn, and on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays, there were—yeas 24, noes 105; less than one fifth in the affirmative.

Mr. FINCK. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. FINCK and BOUTWELL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas twenty-eight; noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 27, nays 126, not voting 38; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Campbell, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, Humphrey, Hunter, Kerr, Latham, Le Blond, Leftwich, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Strouse, Taber, and Trimble—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Bundy, Chandler, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cooper, Cullom, Dawes, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hawkins, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Kuykendall, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercur, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Price, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Ross, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spaulding, Stevens, Stilwell, Stokes, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—126.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, Banks, Blow, Buckland, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Deffrees, Harris, Henderson, Hise, Asahel W. Hubbard, Jenckes, Johnson, Jones, William Lawrence, McCullough, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Starr, Thayer, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Wright—38.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved that the bill be laid upon the table; and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FINCK moved that the House take a recess till half past seven o'clock this evening; and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. FARNSWORTH called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. FARNSWORTH and Mr. ELDRIDGE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported, yeas 80.

So (more than one fifth of those present voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 20, nays 119, not voting 54; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Chanler, Denison, Finck, Glossbrenner, Hise, Johnson, Le Blond, Leftwich, Niblack, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, and Trimble—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Bingham, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cooper, Cullom, Dawson, Deffrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Ferry, Garfield, Goodyear, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spaulding, Stevens, Stokes, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—119.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Banks, Blaine, Blow, Campbell, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hawkins, Henderson, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Hunter, Jones, Kerr, William Lawrence, Marston, McCullough, Patterson, Phelps, Pomeroy, Raymond, Ross, Rousseau, Starr, Stilwell, Taber, Nelson Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Whaley, Windom, Winfield, and Wright—54.

So the motion to adjourn over was disagreed to.

Mr. FINCK moved that the House do now adjourn; and on that motion demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 18, nays 114, not voting 59; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Campbell, Chanler, Denison, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Hise, Johnson, Leftwich, Marshall, Noell, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, and Strouse—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Bidwell, Bingham, Broomall, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Bundy, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cooper, Cullom, Dawes, Dawson, Deffrees, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Ferry, Garfield, Grinnell, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hawkins, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Laffin, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, McRuer, Mercur, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Price, William H. Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Woodbridge—114.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, Benjamin, Blaine, Blow, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dumont, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Goodyear, Griswold, Harris, Henderson, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Jones, Kerr, Kuykendall, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Maynard, McCullough, Morrill, Niblack, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Ross, Rousseau, Scofield, Starr, Stevens, Stilwell, Nelson Taylor, Thayer, Thornton, Trimble, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Whaley, Williams, and Wright—59.

So the House refused to adjourn.

TREASURY NOTES.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting information required by the second section of the act of April 12, 1861; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

STEAMERS EVENING STAR AND COMMODORE.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, in answer to a resolution of the House of the 3d instant, transmitting reports relative to the loss of the steamer Evening Star and the wreck of the steamer Commodore; which was ordered to be printed, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Mr. MOORHEAD asked and obtained leave of absence for Mr. CULVER for ten days.

OATHS FOR ATTORNEYS—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. The pending question is on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. LE BLOND. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order. The motion to fix a time for adjournment has priority over a mere motion to adjourn, but the usage has been in all recent Congresses that the former motion cannot be repeated, after being once decided, until the motion to adjourn has been decided, and for this reason: that one fifth of the members of the House could keep it in session when a majority desired it to adjourn.

Mr. LE BLOND. Then I move that the House take a recess until half past seven o'clock.

The SPEAKER. That does not take precedence; the motion to adjourn must be put before any other motion of a similar character is put.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to inquire what will be the state of this bill if the House adjourns.

The SPEAKER. It will come up to-morrow morning immediately after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a resolution.

Mr. RADFORD. I object.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was decided in the negative—yeas 42, nays 82, not voting 67; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Baxter, Bergen, Bidwell, Boyer, Campbell, Chanler, Cooper, Denison, Farquhar, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hawkins, Hise, Edwin N. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Johnson, Julian, Kerr, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Leftwich, Marshall, McRuer, Miller, Moorhead, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Orth, Radford, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Strouse, Taber, Trimble, Windom, and Winfield—42.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Dawes, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Ferry, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, Hunter, Jenckes, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Laffin, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, Mercur, Morris, Myers, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Sloan, Spaulding, Stokes, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Warner, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—82.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Baldwin, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Bundy, Sidney Clarke, Cook, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Davis, Deffrees, Dumont, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Henderson, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Humphrey, Jones, Kuykendall, Latham, William Lawrence, McCullough, Morrill, Moulton, Newell, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ross, Rousseau, Scofield, Shellabarger, Starr, Stevens, Stilwell, Nelson Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Williams, and Wright—67.

So the motion to adjourn was disagreed to.

Mr. KASSON. I ask the consent of the House, with the approval of the gentleman in charge of this bill, that instead of adjourning we shall suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole upon a very short bill, the Post Office appropriation bill.

Several MEMBERS. I object.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that the House take a recess till half past six o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The pending motion is to take a recess till half past seven o'clock, on which the yeas and nays are ordered.

The question being taken, it was decided in the negative—yeas 19, nays 99, not voting 78; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Baxter, Bergen, Bidwell, Boyer, Bundy, Campbell, Donnelly, Finck, Aaron Harding, Hawkins, Hill, Kerr, Leftwich, Samuel J. Randall, Strouse, and Trimble—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baker, Beaman, Bingham, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cooper, Cullom, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferry, Glossbrenner, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Higby, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Ketcham, Koontz, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, McKee, Mercur, Miller, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, Raymond, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Spaulding, Stokes, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Winfield, and Woodbridge—99.

NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Baldwin, Banks, Barker, Benjamin, Blaine, Blow, Chandler, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Defrees, Dumont, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Garfield, Goodyear, Hale, Harris, Hayes, Henderson, Hise, Asahel W. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kelso, Kuykendall, Latham, William Lawrence, McCullough, McKee, Moorhead, Morrill, Noel, Orth, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ross, Rousseau, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Starr, Stevens, Stilwell, Taber, Nelson Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Windom, and Wright—73.

So the motion was disagreed to.

Mr. FINCK. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BOUTWELL. We have consumed about the time we usually consume in our daily sessions, and perhaps to-morrow we may be able to finish this bill.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object to debate.

Mr. FINCK. I call for the yeas and nays on my motion.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PAINE and BOYER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported thirty-three in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FINCK. I understand that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] is about to make a motion to adjourn, and in that case I will withdraw my motion.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object to the gentleman from Massachusetts or anybody else upon that side of the House entering into debate.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I would like to know whether there will be any objection to taking the vote to-morrow morning if we adjourn now?

Mr. FINCK. Yes; there will be.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Then we will stay here.

Mr. FINCK. Then I insist on my motion. The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 9, nays 78, not voting 106; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Bingham, Campbell, Eldridge, Marshall, Nicholson, Ritter, and Trimble—9.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Baker, Banks, Boutwell, Brandegee, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Farnsworth, Ferry, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Higby, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Keontz, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, McClurg, McIndoe, Mercer, Miller, Morris, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Paine, Perham, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, Raymond, Rogers, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanklin, Shellenbarger, Sloan, Spaulding, Nelson Taylor, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Welker, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—78.

NOT VOTING.—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Blaine, Blow, Boyer, Brownell, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Cooper, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Deming, Denison, Dumont, Eggleston, Farquhar, Finck, Garfield, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hart, Hawkins, Hayes, Henderson, Hise, Hogan, Asahel W. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Leitch, Lynch, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, McKee, McKee, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Niblack, Noel, Orth, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ross, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Starr, Stevens, Stilwell, Stokes, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Wright—106.

So the House refused to adjourn.

During the roll call,

Mr. ASHLEY, of Ohio, stated that he had paired off until twelve o'clock to-morrow with Mr. ROSS.

Mr. LEFTWICH stated that he had paired off with Mr. STOKES.

The SPEAKER. No quorum voted on the last vote.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move that there be a call of the House.

Mr. SPALDING. I second the motion.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was accordingly called; when the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Blaine, Blow, Brownell, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Dawes, Dawson, Defrees, Delano, Dumont, Eckley, Eggleston, Garfield, Goodyear, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Hise, Asahel W. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Jones, Kelly, Kuykendall, Latham, William Lawrence, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, McKee, McKee, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Orth, Patterson, Perham, Phelps, Pike, Plants, Pomeroy, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ross, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Starr, Stevens, Stilwell, Stokes, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Wright.

One hundred and twelve members answered to their names.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. FINCK. On that motion I call the yeas and nays.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I withdraw the motion.

The doors of the House were then closed, and the Clerk proceeded to read the names of the absentees for excuses.

JOHN B. ALLEY.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I wish to say that my colleague, Mr. ALLEY, is absent by leave of the House, his leave extending, I believe, beyond the present time.

The SPEAKER. If the House has granted him leave of absence, he is excused.

OKES AMES.

Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts. I desire to make the same statement in regard to Mr. AMES that I did in regard to Mr. ALLEY—that he is absent on leave.

The SPEAKER. Then he will be excused.

GEORGE W. ANDERSON. No excuse offered.

SAMUEL M. ARNELL.

Mr. HAWKINS. My colleague, Mr. ARNELL, obtained leave of absence for ten days to return to his home.

The SPEAKER. Any gentleman absent on leave is excused, of course.

JOHN D. BALDWIN. No excuse offered.

ABRAHAM A. BARKER. No excuse offered.

PORTUS BAXTER. No excuse offered.

FERNANDO C. BEAMAN. No excuse offered.

JOHN F. BENJAMIN. No excuse offered.

JOHN BIDWELL. No excuse offered.

JAMES G. BLAINE. No excuse offered.

HENRY T. BLOW.

Mr. LOAN. My colleague, Mr. Blow, is absent by leave of the House for an indefinite time.

The SPEAKER. His name will be omitted from the list of absentees.

HENRY P. H. BROMWELL. No excuse offered.

RALPH P. BUCKLAND. No excuse offered.

HEZEKIAH S. BUNDY. No excuse offered.

JOHN W. CHANLER. No excuse offered.

SIDNEY CLARKE.

Mr. GRINNELL. The gentleman from Kansas, Mr. CLARKE, is absent on leave.

The SPEAKER. His name will be stricken from the list.

CHARLES V. CULVER.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. CULVER, obtained leave of absence to-day.

WILLIAM A. DARLING.

Mr. RAYMOND. My colleague, Mr. DARLING, has been absent from the House, first on account of sickness, and now, I believe, on account of a death in his family. I believe he is absent on leave, but at any rate I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

HENRY L. DAWES. No excuse offered.

JOHN L. DAWSON. No excuse offered.

JOSEPH H. DEFREES. No excuse offered.

COLUMBUS DELANO. No excuse offered.

EBENEZER DUMONT.

Mr. INGERSOLL. The gentleman from Indiana, Mr. DUMONT, has been absent during the greater part of the session on account of sickness. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

EPHRAIM R. ECKLEY. No excuse offered.

BENJAMIN EGGLESTON. No excuse offered.

JAMES A. GARFIELD.

Mr. ALLISON. The gentleman from Ohio, Mr. GARFIELD, left the House a few hours ago, complaining of illness. I understand also that he has sickness in his family. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

CHARLES GOODYEAR. No excuse offered.

BENJAMIN G. HARRIS.

Mr. LE BLOND. I received a letter from Mr. HARRIS the other day, saying that his wife was very ill. I think he is absent by leave of the House. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

ROSWELL HART. No excuse offered.

JAMES H. D. HENDERSON.

Mr. PRICE. The gentlemen from Oregon, Mr. HENDERSON, is very sick, confined to his bed. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

ELIJAH HISE. No excuse offered.

ASAHIEL W. HUBBARD.

Mr. GRINNELL. My colleague, Mr. HUBBARD, has been sick all the session and not able to be here at all. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES R. HUBBELL. No excuse offered.

MORGAN JONES.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. My colleague, Mr. JONES, is sick, confined to his room, as he has been during the whole session. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM D. KELLEY. No excuse offered.

ANDREW J. KUYKENDALL. No excuse offered.

GEORGE R. LATHAM. No excuse offered.

WILLIAM LAWRENCE.

Mr. WELKER. My colleague, Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio, is absent by leave of the House for an indefinite time.

The SPEAKER. That is the fact. His name will be stricken from the list of absentees.

JAMES M. MARVIN.

Mr. MERCUR. The gentleman from New York, Mr. MARVIN, left the Hall about an hour and a half ago, observing that he felt quite unwell. I move that he be excused.

The motion was not agreed to.

HORACE MAYNARD. No excuse offered.

HIRAM MCCULLOUGH. No excuse offered.

SAMUEL MCKEE. No excuse offered.

DONALD C. MCIVER. No excuse offered.

JAMES K. MOORHEAD. No excuse offered.

JUSTIN S. MORRILL. No excuse offered.

SAMUEL W. MOULTON. No excuse offered.

GODLOVE S. ORTH. No excuse offered.

JAMES W. PATTERSON.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman from New Hampshire, Mr. PATTERSON, stated to me an hour or two ago that it was indispensably necessary that he should leave; and he requested me to pair with him on this bill. I do not know whether the fact that he is paired is an excuse for his absence.

The SPEAKER. Pairing has not been regarded as an excuse for absence under a call of the House.

Mr. HALE. I presume the gentleman was under the impression that it was a valid excuse. I move that he be excused.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I rise to make an inquiry of the Chair. I desire to know whether it is not, by the usages of the House, allowable for one member to pair with another and be absent?

The SPEAKER. It is; but the fact of a member being paired does not operate as an excuse for absence when a call of the House is ordered. Otherwise the absentees might all be paired off. The rule is that no member can absent himself from the House without its leave while it is in session.

SIDNEY PERHAM. No excuse offered.

CHARLES E. PHELPS. No excuse offered.

FREDERICK A. PIKE. No excuse offered.

TOBIAS A. PLANTS. No excuse offered.

THEODORE M. POMEROY.

Mr. KETCHAM. My colleague, Mr. POMEROY, was called away to New York very unexpectedly this morning on important business. I move that he be excused.

The motion was not agreed to.

ALEXANDER H. RICE. No excuse offered.

JOHN H. RICE. No excuse offered.

LEWIS W. ROSS. No excuse offered.

LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU.

Mr. HOGAN. I presume that General ROUSSEAU, who has been absent two or three weeks, is away by leave of the House. I move that he be excused.

The motion was not agreed to.

CHARLES SITGREAVES. No excuse offered.

JOHN F. STARR. No excuse offered.

THADDEUS STEVENS.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that my colleague, Mr. STEVENS, be excused.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. STEVENS told me when he left that he was sick and could not stay here any longer.

The motion of Mr. BROOMALL was agreed to.

THOMAS N. STILWELL. No excuse offered.

WILLIAM B. STOKES. No excuse offered.

M. RUSSELL THAYER.

Mr. O'NEILL. My colleague, Mr. THAYER, is detained at home by continued illness in his family. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN L. THOMAS. No excuse offered.

ANTHONY THORNTON. No excuse offered.

ROBERT T. VAN HORN.

Mr. LOAN. My colleague, Mr. VAN HORN, left the city during the recess at the time of the Christmas holidays and went to Missouri. I understand that he is sick there and unable to return.

Mr. HOGAN. He was sick when he went away.

Mr. LOAN. I do not know whether he has leave of absence or not. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

ANDREW H. WARD.

Mr. SHANKLIN. My colleague, Mr. WARD, has been confined to his room for several days by sickness. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

HAMILTON WARD. No excuse offered.

SAMUEL L. WARNER. No excuse offered.

ELIHU B. WASHBURN.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] has been granted leave of absence for the remainder of the session. His name will be stricken from the list of absentees.

HENRY D. WASHBURN. No excuse offered.

WILLIAM B. WASHBURN. No excuse offered.

STEPHEN F. WILSON. No excuse offered.

WILLIAM WINDOM. No excuse offered.

EDWIN R. V. WRIGHT.

Mr. NEWELL. My colleague, Mr. WRIGHT, is at his home sick, unable to be here. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRINNELL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms take into custody the members absent without leave and bring them to the bar of the House forthwith.

Mr. HILL. I move to amend that those who are outside of the Hall may be permitted to come in.

The SPEAKER. Members who are absent will be taken into custody as they appear.

Mr. HALE. Can those members who may be seen looking through the glass doors be said to appear here? [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. They only appear through the glass darkly. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. HILL. I withdraw my amendment. I understand that those who are outside will appear and surrender themselves.

Mr. GRINNELL's motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON. I ask that I be excused by the House from further service during this day's session on account of sickness, and submit the motion accordingly.

The House divided; and there were—ayes eighty-one; noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The doors seem to be leaking.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state who has been allowed to come in.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The gentleman from West Virginia seems to have dropped from some quarter.

Mr. WHALEY. In reply I will say I was here when the roll was called and answered to my name, and if the Clerk did not hear me I cannot help it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk did not hear the gentleman's answer.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Has the Doorkeeper the right to let members in upon their own statement?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Wisconsin that the Doorkeeper always requires every member to answer whether he answered to his name on the call of the House, and when they answer they did he allows them to enter the House.

The Chair will also state that during the pendency of a call of the House permission is uniformly given to members on their parole to be absent for a few moments.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I demand that the Sergeant-at-Arms shall enforce the warrant of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Clerks are preparing the warrant.

Mr. RADFORD moved the House adjourn.

Mr. PAINE called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, demanded tellers.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House refused to adjourn.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, and reported he had under the warrant of the House now in custody Mr. PERHAM and Mr. ECKLEY.

The SPEAKER. Mr. PERHAM, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer therefor?

Mr. PERHAM. I felt in need of my dinner and went home and procured it. The only complaint I have to make is, that when I returned I was kept waiting for a long time before I could get in.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move the gentleman be excused.

Mr. RADFORD. On the payment of costs.

The amendment was agreed to; and the motion, as amended, was adopted.

The SPEAKER. Mr. ECKLEY, you have been absent without leave of the House. What excuse have you to make?

Mr. ECKLEY. When I left the House I was under the impression it was about to adjourn. That impression I received from the action of those who had charge of the bill. Like the gentleman from Maine, I felt much in need of my dinner for the sustenance of the inner man, and after getting it I returned here and had to wait for a long time before I was allowed to come in.

I was absent without leave of the House, for which I beg its pardon. I did not mean any disrespect to the House.

Mr. SPALDING moved his colleague be excused on payment of costs.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM. My colleague, Mr. LE BLOND, desired to be heard on this question, and I move he be heard for ten minutes.

Mr. LE BLOND. I did not ask to be heard upon this bill, but on the one reported by the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BINGHAM. I was mistaken then, and apologize to my colleague.

Mr. RADFORD. I hope gentlemen on the other side will be willing to make some compromise, and fix an hour when the vote shall be taken.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I object to any compromise.

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with. The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. In consideration of the attention and devotedness of the members present, I move they shall be allowed a recess of five minutes.

The SPEAKER. That would dispense with the proceedings under the call.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. It does not seem to be the wish of the House, and I withdraw it.

Mr. RADFORD. I ask for leave of absence.

Mr. SPALDING. I object.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, and reported that, in compliance with its warrant, he had now in custody Mr. DELANO and Mr. BUCKLAND.

The SPEAKER. Mr. DELANO, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. DELANO. I went home, got my dinner, and returned as soon as I could.

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. Was the gentleman arrested?

Mr. DELANO. I came back voluntarily and hunted up the Sergeant-at-Arms. [Laughter.]

Mr. MILLER. I move the gentleman be excused on payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BUCKLAND, you have been absent without leave of the House. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BUCKLAND. My only excuse is I went to get my dinner.

Mr. RADFORD. I move the gentleman be excused on the payment of fees.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the gentleman procured his dinner at the restaurant below stairs it must have been so miserable a one that I am quite sure it was punishment enough. [Laughter.]

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS. I move each one of the members be furnished with a ham sandwich at the expense of the House.

Mr. HOGAN. To be paid out of the contingent fund.

The SPEAKER. As it involves an appropriation it must be first considered in the Committee of the Whole. [Laughter.]

Mr. BOYER. I move the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I wish to present a motion, and to explain it I ask the Clerk to read the paper I send up.

The Clerk read as follows:

The common understanding of the reason why a State forfeits State rights by its hostility to the United States, as evidenced by the adoption of an ordinance of secession—

Mr. COOPER. I object to any further reading.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move all further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I move that I shall be excused from further attendance on this day's session of the House; and I ask a paper to be read in support of that motion.

Mr. SPALDING. Is it a physician's certificate?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I rise to ask a question of the Chair as to the right of a member to deny me the privilege of being heard on a question of this kind. I ask the House to excuse me. I may have the best reasons in the world, and yet gentlemen deny me the privilege of giving them. Now, is that parliamentary?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is, unless the gentleman gives his reasons for desiring to be excused.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Am I compelled to give them verbally? Can I not send them to the Clerk's desk? I have an elaborate article prepared on the subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I will say to the gentleman that I objected out of deference to himself.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I was not aware the gentleman had so much regard for me.

Mr. HILL. I suppose the gentleman places it upon the ground that he is not to give his reasons upon compulsion.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Although they should be as thick as blackberries I would not do it. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that the gentleman can give his reasons for asking to be excused, but he cannot have them read without permission of the House.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I suppose I can read them myself?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Well, sir, on some more happy occasion perhaps the House will hear them. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I would like to know what occasion that will be. [Laughter.]

Mr. BINGHAM. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to—ayes 27, noes 68.

Mr. WENTWORTH. Would it be in order to have the President's message read? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It would not; no business can be transacted during the pendency of the call of the House.

Mr. KASSON. Is there a quorum present? The SPEAKER. There is.

Mr. KASSON. Then I move to suspend further proceedings under the call for the purpose of proceeding with the business of the House.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. GRINNELL. I ask if it is in order to move that the Speaker appoint an assistant Sergeant-at-Arms so that members may be brought in with greater facility?

The SPEAKER. The Sergeant-at-Arms has power to appoint special messengers under the rule of the House.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I rise to a question of order; whether it is in order for lunch to be distributed on the desks of members during business hours. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman insist upon the point of order?

Mr. INGERSOLL. I make it in good faith.

The SPEAKER. The Chair rules that it is not in order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I then ask that the order be carried into execution.

The SPEAKER. The Doorkeeper will execute the order.

Mr. HILL. Does that rule extend to apples? I am interested, as I have just sent for half a dozen. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I move that the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary [Mr. WILSON, of Iowa] be excused out of deference to his position as chairman of that committee, and also taking into consideration his age. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has not himself asked to be excused.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, having finished my lunch, I ask that the order of the House be enforced and that the articles be removed. [Laughter.]

Mr. RADFORD. Mr. Speaker, I want to know if the freedman yonder is a member of the House; if not, I ask that the floor may be cleared. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. He is one of the employes of the House, and therefore entitled to be present.

Mr. RADFORD. Mr. Speaker, is good faith now I propose that the House adjourn; and on that motion I call the yeas and nays.

On ordering yeas and nays there were—ayes nine.

Mr. LYNCH. I demand tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. LYNCH and RADFORD.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 2, noes 3. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. One fifth having voted in the affirmative, the yeas and nays are ordered. [Laughter.]

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 13, nays 89, not voting 89; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baker, Bergen, Bingham, Campbell, Cooper, Denison, Glossbrenner, Hale, Edwin N. Hubbell, Ketcham, Miller, Rogers, and Trimble—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Banks, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Culom, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferry, Finck, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Holmes, Hotchkiss, Chester D. So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to. The Sergeant-at-Arms here appeared and announced that in obedience to the warrant of the Speaker he had arrested and produced at the bar of the House, Mr. ORTH, of Indiana.

The SPEAKER. Mr. ORTH, you have been absent from this House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. ORTH. I do not know that I have any very good excuse to offer to this House. I remained here until I was satisfied that I would have a very late dinner if I got any at all. I trusted to the good sense of this House to soon adjourn; but I must confess that my confidence was misplaced, although I set the example myself of leaving the House. And I will also say that I saved the Sergeant-at-Arms from any unnecessary traveling, because I was arrested by him near the door of the House.

Mr. KOONTZ. I move that the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. ORTH, be excused upon the payment of the usual fees.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to amend by adding the following:

And being subjugated he shall submit to suffrage without regard to race or color and shall take the test oath. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the amendment is not in order.

The question was taken; and the motion of Mr. KOONTZ was agreed to.

The Sergeant-at-Arms also announced that in obedience to the warrant of the Speaker he had arrested and now produced at the bar of the House, Mr. HISE, of Kentucky.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HISE, you have been absent from this House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. HISE. May I inquire, being new to legislative forms and proceedings, what will be the penalty if I have no sufficient excuse to render for my absence?

The SPEAKER. It is within the discretion of the House. The usual penalty is the payment of fees to the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. HISE. I have the floor for a few moments, I suppose, for the purpose of rendering my excuse.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman has the floor for the purpose of stating his reasons for his absence.

Mr. HISE. I did not leave the Chamber until after the usual hour of adjournment; it was a few minutes after four o'clock before I left. I was very much fatigued by close attention for some hours to the proceedings of the House. I was also somewhat dispirited, I acknowledge, with the appearance of things in the House as I left it. I perceived that a bill, constituting, I supposed, one of a series of measures, had been brought into the House, and the supporters of the bill called for this extraordinary previous question, denying the privilege of discussion upon the subject. It was a bill which, with its conferees and associate measures, in my deliberate judgment, makes an assault upon one of the main pillars of this Government, and strikes down one of the corner-stones of our political fabric.

Mr. KOONTZ. I rise to a question of order. Is the gentleman in order in thus making a speech upon this occasion?

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Hise] is not in order. The gentleman must state his reasons for his absence without leave. The opinion of the gentleman upon a pending bill is not a reason for absence; it is a good reason for his remaining in the House. [Laughter.]

Mr. HISE. I think I can show that my remarks are pertinent.

Mr. LE BLOND. Is it not a good reason why a member should leave the House that he sees that one of the arms of the Government is being assailed? [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is out of order.

Mr. HISE. When I left the Chamber I thought I perceived that my further presence here would be unnecessary and unavailable. I was not willing to be present and see a measure of that description—

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman is out of order.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I move that the time of the member from Kentucky [Mr. Hise] be extended. [Great laughter.]

Mr. HISE. I was proceeding to show the motives and reasons why I absented myself. Be they good or be they bad, still they are the reasons I have for leaving the Chamber as I did; and they constitute the excuse, and almost the only excuse, I have to offer. I had heard the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] get up on this floor and proclaim and declare the most monstrous and horrible opinions that ever had been uttered either in or out of this House. [Cries of "Order!" "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. It is clearly not in order for the gentleman to indulge in strictures upon the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] or any other gentleman, in rendering his excuse for being absent without leave.

Mr. SLOAN. Is it not the duty of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. Hise] to take his seat after he has been called to order until he has the leave of the House to proceed?

The SPEAKER. After the Chair has ruled that a member is out of order in his remarks the Chair has nothing further to do in the matter. It is for a member, if he desires it, to insist that the member called to order shall take his seat until leave is given by the House for him to proceed in order.

Mr. HISE. I was merely remarking that I had heard opinions declared and views announced in regard to the structure and form of Government—

The SPEAKER. These remarks of the gentleman are clearly out of order.

Mr. HISE. Well, I will state that I thought

I perceived that if I remained in this Chamber there was no hope that I could obtain the exercise of the privilege of responding to those opinions, or of making known my opposition to the monstrous measure now before the House. I furthermore state that in connection with that I was wearied and fatigued with my attendance here, and I thought that perhaps my personal presence was not material or necessary in any way, either to prevent the adoption of that measure or to give the opposition to its adoption any aid or assistance. I perceived that there were motions to lay on the table, to adjourn, and other motions by which the session of the House would be protracted to a very unreasonable hour in the night. And as I had done my usual duty, and had performed my usual amount of labor during the day, I hoped that I might retire without any prejudice to the public service.

Mr. GRINNELL. Is it in order to move that the gentleman have leave to print the remainder of his remarks?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not, as the reasons the gentleman is giving are to influence the action of the House at this time.

Mr. SPALDING. I would inquire if the gentleman left with the intention of again returning?

Mr. HISE. I left with the intention of returning to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

Mr. LE BLOND. I move that the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HISE] be excused upon the payment of the usual fees.

Mr. HISE. I came here immediately upon the summons of the officer without any delay, and here I am. [Laughter.]

Mr. PRICE. As a reason for excusing the gentleman it may be urged that he gives the same reasons for absents himself to-day that the members of the southern confederacy gave for absents themselves in 1860.

Mr. RADFORD. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRICE] is not in order in the remarks he is making.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. LE BLOND, that Mr. HISE be excused upon the payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. I desire to move an amendment to the motion of my colleague, [Mr. LE BLOND.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is too late; the motion of his colleague [Mr. LE BLOND] has been agreed to.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I move to reconsider the vote by which the motion to excuse the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HISE] was agreed to.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Upon that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I rise to a question of order: whether this business can be done while the order is being executed for a call of the House?

The SPEAKER. What rule prohibits it?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I inquired of the Speaker.

The SPEAKER. That is the exact way in which the call proceeds. The motion to reconsider is of course in order, and it may be laid on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Suppose there is no quorum present?

The SPEAKER. The call of the House presumes there is not a quorum present.

Mr. STROUSE. I ask unanimous consent to excuse my colleague, Mr. DENISON, from further attendance at this sitting, as he is indisposed.

No objection was made.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a point of order. Gentlemen who are supposed to be in the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms are occupying their seats in this Hall. I ask if that is permissible.

The SPEAKER. It is not; gentlemen who are under arrest cannot occupy their seats until they are discharged from custody.

Mr. WENTWORTH. I would inquire what effect the decision of the Supreme Court has upon these arrests? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair is not aware what effect that will have.

The question being taken on the motion to lay on the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the House excused Mr. HISE on payment of the usual fees, it was decided in the negative—yeas 48; noes 53, not voting 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Bergen, Bingham, Boyer, Buckland, Campbell, Cooper, Eldridge, Eliot, Farquhar, Finck, Gloss, Gresham, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hogan, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hunter, Kerr, George W. Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Lynch, Marshall, Miller, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, Radford, Samuel J. NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Broomall, Chandler, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Cook, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, De-frees, Denison, Dumont, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Garfield, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Hise, Ashael W. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburn, Henry D. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Wright—90.

So the motion was not laid on the table.

The question recurred on the motion to reconsider the vote by which Mr. HISE was excused on payment of the fee.

Mr. SCHENCK. Upon that motion I desire as a reason for the vote I shall give to have some of the language used by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HISE] read from the Clerk's desk. I hope the reporter will be called upon to read his notes.

Mr. RADFORD. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman has no right to present his views at this time.

The SPEAKER. It is in the province of the gentleman from Ohio, on the motion to reconsider, to state why the gentleman from Kentucky should not be excused on the payment of the fee. That motion opens the whole question; the motion to lay it on the table being rejected.

Mr. SCHENCK. If the motion to reconsider shall prevail, I propose to move some fine by way of amendment to the motion to discharge the gentleman on payment of the usual fee, because I think a fine ought to be imposed. I think when a member is called upon to present his excuse for his absence and he takes advantage of that opportunity to announce secession doctrines on this floor and to abuse the chairman of the committee who reported the bill under consideration, he ought to be made an example of. And I ask, as a reason for the vote which I shall give, and in illustration of the remarks which I shall make, first for the reading of this extract from the notes of the reporters, which I send to the Chair, containing what he said about Mr. BOUTWELL.

The Clerk read as follows:

"I have heard the gentleman from Massachusetts get up on this floor and proclaim and declare the most monstrous and horrible opinions that ever had been uttered either in or out of this House."

Mr. SCHENCK. I also ask that the remarks made by the gentleman previous to that shall be read from the notes of the reporters. I am willing; however, to rest the case upon this attack made upon the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] who introduced the bill; an attack made by the gentleman from Kentucky under cover of an excuse for his absence. I call the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. BINGHAM. I hope not; I desire to make some remarks upon the question.

Mr. LE BLOND. Can the previous question be ordered when the House is carrying out an order for a call of the House, when the Speaker has already announced that that presupposes there to be a minority of this House present?

The SPEAKER. Upon all the questions growing out of a call of the House, and arising from the power of the House over its absent members, the previous question and a motion to lay upon the table are in order under the rules of the House.

Mr. LE BLOND. I hope my colleague will withdraw the demand for the previous question. I would like very much to be heard for a moment in reply to my colleague.

Mr. SCHENCK. I wish simply to say that I have no desire myself to debate this matter, and no desire to hear it debated. I leave the case just where it was, that, in the exercise of the privilege to give an excuse for his absence, the gentlemen from Kentucky, at least, whatever may be thought of anything else he said, took advantage of the occasion to attack a member of this House, and that is the reason why I shall vote to reconsider in order to afford an opportunity to see whether the House will not impose a further punishment than the easy and lenient course of merely discharging the member on payment of costs.

Mr. HALE. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] if he claims that the language of the gentleman from Kentucky as read from the Clerk's desk is unparliamentary.

Mr. SCHENCK. I do claim it to be unparliamentary, but that is not the point I make. I present it as a proof of the fact that he availed himself of the opportunity to assault one of the members of this House, denouncing him as having uttered the most monstrous and horrible opinions he ever heard expressed here or anywhere else.

Mr. HALE. Then I would ask the gentleman would it be right in his judgment to impose a fine upon a member of this House for language which was not unparliamentary? And that being the question, I wish to submit the question to the Speaker whether the language of the gentleman from Kentucky was unparliamentary.

The SPEAKER. That is not a question for the ruling of the Chair on this proposition. It is within the province of the House to decide what penalties it will inflict upon its absent members.

Mr. HISE. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. SCHENCK. Not to make a speech on this question. I will move myself to allow the gentleman to respond hereafter, when a motion is made to impose any further punishment upon him; but I do not want him to argue this question.

Mr. HISE. I never yet understood, may it please the Speaker and the House, that to characterize the opinions of a member of a legislative body as monstrous, as untenable, as opinions which, if carried out into practice, would be subversive of the character of the Government of the United States, could be properly construed into personal abuse. Political, constitutional, and legal opinions expressed upon the floor of this House, in the course of the transaction of the public business, are fair subjects for criticism and remark. The words "monstrous," "extraordinary," and "horrible," are terms and expressions by which the extent and degree of our opposition to those opinions may be made manifest. That does not amount to personal abuse. How often have gentlemen upon the other side of the House characterized gentlemen upon this side as "traitors" and "rebels" and "cop-perheads," and characterized their principles and views as "falacious," as the views of "factionists," as the views of "secessionists," as "revolutionary," "rebellious," and all that, without even being called to order for it?

Now, I intended no personal disrespect to the gentleman from Massachusetts, none whatever; but I looked upon him as being an educated man, and as belonging to that extreme latitudinarian school of politicians which encourages and entertains views somewhat similar but not nearly as ultra as the views which he seemed to express to-day. The views which he expressed to-day tended, it seemed to me, simply to this: that the legislative department of this Government is supreme, and that the executive and judicial departments are subservient, to be ruled by it without regard to constitutional checks and limitations on their power. That, I thought, was the tendency of his views, and I characterized them as monstrous, but I did it with no intention of personal disrespect toward the gentleman, none whatever.

I brought it in in connection with my excuse for my absence, and I really and conscientiously believe I was not out of order in reverting to his remarks to-day in making my excuse. What effect must it not have had upon a man of my political opinions to hear such views expressed upon this floor? Sir, it saddened me. It produced a feeling of melancholy and sadness which I could not control. I had no chance to speak, and no opportunity of expressing my views or explaining my position to the House. There was a struggle apparently going on, on the one side for delay, in the hope of getting an opportunity to discuss hereafter this most important and dangerous measure, and upon the other side to maintain their position in passing this measure without discussion or debate, so that the country may not be enlightened in regard to it, though we may be. I had no intention to be out of order; but in this state of mind and feeling, when I had been here desiring to speak and hoping to get an opportunity to speak and express my strong and indignant opposition to the doctrines expressed by that gentleman and their tendency, and despairing of that opportunity and having exhausted myself by my anxiety and attention to business, after the hour of four o'clock had arrived, inasmuch as my age and time of life make it necessary that I should have some repose, I retired from the Chamber without intending any disrespect to the House or to the authority of the House, and the very moment the Sergeant-at-Arms came to me and notified me that there was a call of the House and that my presence was demanded, I came up here.

The gentleman from Ohio is totally mistaken in supposing that I have voluntarily gone out of my way to indulge in any personal abuse of the gentleman from Massachusetts. I adverted to his opinions only to show the great anxiety I had to respond to them and oppose them. I despaired of an opportunity of doing so, and in that way, my mind and feelings being affected by the scenes that occurred here to-day, I retired from the Chamber under the idea that my presence would be of no service to my side of the House, that no opportunity for discussion would be allowed, and that the vote would not be taken this afternoon.

Now, sir, I never have departed and I never will depart from the subject-matter in hand. I desire to treat all subjects before the House in a legitimate, fair, and argumentative manner. It has been my habit all my lifetime, when I have been called to the discussion of any subject, either in legislative halls before the people or at the bar, to confine myself to the subject-matter in hand. I have never allowed myself to go out of the way and indulge in personal abuse of men opposed to me, either in the Legislature, before the people, or at the bar. Therefore, if the gentleman understood me as designedly or voluntarily going out of the way and departing from the proper rules of decorum in making the allusion I did to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] he misunderstood my motives at least, if he did not put a wrong construction upon what I said. I care but little about being fined. I suppose I have furnished about as good and reasonable an excuse for my departure from this Chamber as any other delinquent who was absent when the roll was called.

Mr. SCHENCK. After having yielded to the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HISE] to make his explanation of his motives and purposes, I feel it due to myself as well as to the House to be a little more explicit in presenting the point raised by the question now pending. In objecting to the language used by the gentleman from Kentucky in presenting his excuse for absence from the House, I do not wish to be understood as construing it to be a personal assault prompted by personal hostility or enmity in any shape toward the gentleman from Massachusetts. The ground I take is this: the gentleman was absent at the call of the roll; he was sent for; was arrested and has been brought to the bar of the House by the Sergeant-at-Arms, and has been called upon for his excuse for his absence. In making that excuse he assigns as a reason for his absence that while he was here he had heard such monstrous doctrines, such horrible opinions expressed by the gentleman from Massachusetts that he was so saddened and dispirited that he left the House, because he had become satisfied, from the course of proceeding here, that such was the tyranny of this House he could not exercise his rights here as a Representative.

Now, I do not think I have overstated his language, and before I take my seat I may ask for the reading from the Globe reporter's notes of the language he did use. My objection is not so much to an attack upon a particular member, as to his characterizing the opinions of that member as horrible in connection with his reasons for leaving the House, and his conclusion that this House was a tyrannical body, in which he could not exercise his rights as a member. That I claim to be an arraignment of the majority of this House, under color of giving an excuse for his absence. That is the point I desire to have presented here. But the gentleman makes such disclaimer of motives that I hardly know whether to insist upon a reconsideration of the vote excusing him or not.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. SCHENCK. Certainly.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I did not hear the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. HISE] when he was making his explanation to the House, nor did I know what he had said until the words were reported from the Clerk's desk. I certainly should not have felt particularly aggrieved by the remarks which the gentleman made. I myself indulge in great frankness of expression about measures, and sometimes about men; and no doubt I am oftentimes under the necessity of soliciting the charity of others to put the most favorable construction upon what I may say; and I am always disposed to put a similar construction upon what is said by others.

I trust the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SCHENCK] will not press this matter upon the ground of any personal regard which I know he entertains for myself. If he supposes that the course of remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky in any way infringes the rights of a majority of the House, that is a question with which I have no more concern than any other member of this House. The House will vindicate its own rights and privileges of course.

Now, I desire to make a remark a little outside of this present matter, which is somewhat personal. The Committee on the Judiciary commenced reporting this morning. It has but two hours of the time of the House now, and will probably have no more of the time of the House during this session. It had several important measures which it desired to report and to have passed, if such should be the judgment of the House.

Our friends on the other side of the House I think ought to consider, when they express the idea that we exercise some tyranny in pressing these measures, that we have only two hours at our command for the purpose of bringing before this body, and soliciting its favorable action upon them, all the measures which have been submitted to the Judiciary Committee. Now, if we allow gentlemen to indulge in great latitude of discussion, the business of the House, so far as it is in the hands of the Committee on the Judiciary, would soon be at an end. I think that ought to be a reason why a member of the Judiciary Committee reporting a measure should be excused from the charge of exercising any tyrannical force over the minority.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I want to inquire of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] if he considers that any fair or reasonable opportunity for debate has been granted to gentlemen upon this side of the House to make such remarks and argument as the character and importance of the subject would require of members of any deliberative body?

Mr. BOUTWELL. If the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] asks me whether I think the brief time, something less than two hours, which was accorded to the discussion of this subject this morning, is the time that should be given to a question of this sort, I say frankly that in my judgment it is not sufficient time.

But if he asks me whether, under the rule of this House, by which the Committee on the Judiciary as well as the members of the House are bound, it was reasonable for the Committee on the Judiciary to give more time than was given this morning, then I must say that I think we gave all the time which, with reference to the business in our charge, we had a right to give. But the gentlemen on the other side will recollect that two of the three persons who first addressed the House on the pending bill were gentlemen on the other side, and that then I gave way to my colleague upon the committee, its chairman, the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. WILSON,] to speak for a few minutes.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The remark made by the gentleman from Massachusetts is subject to misapprehension. He stated the committee had two hours to report, and seemed to indicate that was all the time which could possibly be devoted to the discussion of these measures. I understand the rule to be they may report in that time and that it gives as much time as the House may wish for the discussion of any question. It is not necessary they should be all discussed and passed in two hours.

Mr. HISE. I simply rise for the purpose of responding to the few remarks made by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL,] and I hope in the same temper which he has exhibited. Of course I have no personal acquaintance with him, not the least. I do not know what his name is. All I know is, his appearance and manner in the discussion of this subject have made a favorable impression on my mind as to his being a gentleman of cultivated intellect and of superior education and attainments, a gentleman of courtesy and kindness. I had not the slightest intention to impute to him any intentional departure from what was proper, but only alluded to him as belonging to the latitudinarian school of politicians.

Therefore so far as the gentleman from Ohio has based his motion for inflicting an additional pecuniary fine upon me on the ground I went out of my way to abuse the gentleman from Massachusetts, he is entirely mistaken. I did not intend any personal abuse. In the few remarks I submitted a few moments ago, I did not go out of my way violently to characterize the attempts of that gentleman as horrible and extraordinary. It was in my way to do so on my privilege in making an excuse for my absence from the House. I did not make it personal. I thought it was pertinent, for part of my excuse was that we were denied all expression of our views, while those on the other side of the Chamber had opportunity to enunciate their doctrines. I was affected by a feeling of sadness and melancholy; I was fatigued and went out, not supposing the vote would be taken until to-morrow, when we could place ourselves upon the record against this most monstrous measure.

I did not use the word tyrannical in regard to this House. At the same time permit me to be frank enough to confess that to me the course taken seems to be arbitrary in the extreme; that is, for gentlemen to get up a measure of that sort, the tendency of which, the true construction and understanding of which, cannot come to us at the moment, and after they have said what they want to say to rally their own party then to close the discussion, so that we cannot tell the country and our constituents what we think on the subject.

I am not experienced in legislation. I never was in Congress before, although I was in the State Legislature. No such practice ever attained there. I am not familiar with the rules, and it requires time, especially with old men who do not learn so fast, to find out these rules. I was taken thoroughly and completely by surprise by the demand for the previous question, by which a man who introduces a measure presents it at the Clerk's desk, makes an eulogy of the measure, and then forces it through without discussion on our part to enlighten our constituents on the subject. It seems to me to be arbitrary, though the gentleman says he does not think it to be arbitrary. Gentlemen on the other side may be generous in their personal character, but I must say they appear to act tyrannically in the way they force these measures through without proper consideration.

Now if a young member sees a thing in this light I think he ought to be excused. [Laughter.] So it looks to me. I have been on this floor something like eight weeks and have been endeavoring to get the floor and to be heard on every important question that has come up before the House. I have been fuming and fretting, being compelled all the time, with emotions swelling in my bosom, and thoughts pouring into my brain, to hold my peace and say not a word. [Laughter.] Now this looks to me very unlike free discussion. I am aware the majority of the House are not liberal.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman allow me a single question?

Mr. HISE. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. Am I mistaken in saying that he has already occupied four hours of the time of the House for discussion at the present session? Such is my impression—that one speech of his occupied some three hours and another one.

Mr. HISE. I will frankly confess that probably I have consumed about three hours and a half, two and a half of which were occupied in the discussion of the President's message in Committee of the Whole, when it is supposed that young members might be quite discursive and immethodical in the presentation of their views. But it will be observed that notwithstanding I had, under the practice and rule of the Committee of the Whole, that latitude of discussion, I confined myself in a close and what I believe to have been a logical argument on the sole question of the constitutional right of the southern States to representation on this floor. I did not wander from it for a moment. There were other measures, it is true. For instance, the bill introduced for the disfranchisement of the southern States by depriving them of their political right of representation, and at the same time of their right to their due weight in the election of President of the United States.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. HISE. Not till I have answered the gentleman's first question. [Laughter.] On another question I got the floor on the reconstruction bill. I had a word to say and was cut off right in the midst of my argument. [Laughter.] I had barely time in the one hour allowed me by what is called the hour rule to set forth the basis of the argument I intended to make on the subject when down came the hammer. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRINNELL. I rise to a point of order, whether the gentleman is speaking under the hour rule now. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman is speaking under the hour rule.

Mr. HISE. On another occasion some gentleman was kind enough to allow me, as I understood fifteen minutes. It turned out it was only eight minutes, so that in the very midst almost of my first sentence down came the hammer. [Laughter.] That is about all the opportunity I have had for public discussion upon the floor of a Republican Congress or of a Congress of a republican Government. So it goes. [Laughter.]

Now, in respect to my friend from Ohio, [Mr. SCHENCK.] I think he ought to consider my age and my inexperience as a member of this body. But, sir, I have no idea the gentleman was in earnest—not the least; because if he was in earnest, and the proceedings of this House are to be stopped during their progress by calling a member to order for using abusive epithets, and a motion is to be made that a fine shall be imposed upon gentlemen for the use of unbecoming and improper language, why, sir, we would have a fund in the Treasury before the end of the session, provided gentlemen paid their fines in all cases, that would pay all the contingent expenses of the House. [Laughter.]

I am sure that if gentlemen here were to be punished for all their personal abuse and for all their violations of order by the use of invectives and abusive epithets, as the gentleman proposes to punish me by the infliction of a fine, why it would make a sum total that would relieve the distress of all the poor, black and white, in the city of Washington during this winter. That is my opinion.

Having said thus much, I have nothing more to say, unless the gentleman will learn to understand what we mean by liberality and courtesy, and consent that this measure now before the House be postponed to some day certain for the purpose of discussion, and enable me to add two other hours to the four that I have already occupied. [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I was about to bring this matter, I thought, to a close, and an amicable one, when I yielded the floor for a moment to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOWWELL.] I have already stated to the House that I did not put the vote which I propose to give upon reconsideration—for I have made no motion—upon the ground of the personal attack made upon the gentleman from Massachusetts, but upon the ground that what was said about the gentleman from Massachusetts was incidental to an explanation made by the gentleman from Kentucky, in which he arraigned this House, as I thought, for its tyrannical course; whether he used that precise word or not I do not know, under the pretext of giving an excuse for his absence. The gentleman from Kentucky has made, however, so frankly and so fully, I think I may say, an explanation of his entire want of personal animosity toward anybody upon this side of the House, and that his disposition to arraign the House as tyrannical was only Pickwickian, that I feel bound to accept that explanation, and for one I shall not press the motion to reconsider further, and I hope the House will take into consideration, as I do, the want of experience of the juvenile member from Kentucky, which he has pleaded here. I am disposed, for one, to accept that explanation and be satisfied; and if the House will excuse me for having turned the faucet on this occasion, I promise never to set it running again. [Laughter.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. In order to close the faucet I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

The Sergeant-at-Arms appeared at the bar of the House, and reported that in obedience to the warrant of the Speaker he had arrested and had in custody at the bar Messrs. MORRILL, PLANTS, HUBBELL, of Ohio, McRUER, STILLWELL, ANDERSON, of Missouri, PIKE, BEAMAN, EGGLESTON, GOODYEAR, STARR, BIDWELL, BAXTER, and WASHBURN, of Indiana.

The SPEAKER. Mr. MORRILL, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. MORRILL. I think, Mr. Speaker, that if you will examine the record you will find that I was absent with the leave of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of Ways and Means has a right to sit during the sessions of the House. If the committee was in session the gentleman had a right to be absent. When a gentleman who is on that committee desires to vote the Chair always presumes that he was absent on official business; but on a call of the House that permission does not apply unless the gentleman himself states that he was absent in attendance on the committee.

Mr. MORRILL. I have no other excuse to offer.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move that the gentleman be excused on payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. EGGLESTON, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. EGGLESTON. At the place where I am taking my meals I find that the boarders fare best who get there early. The first table is always the best. I was very hungry, and did not think that we should get a vote upon this bill, so I went down to get my dinner and was arrested at my boarding place. That is the only excuse I have to offer.

Mr. ROLLINS. I move that the gentleman be excused on payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. GOODYEAR, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer for your absence?

Mr. GOODYEAR. My only excuse is that I had an engagement in the city at six o'clock, and went down for the purpose of meeting it. I was about coming back when the Sergeant-at-Arms notified me that I was wanted.

Mr. RADFORD. I move that the gentleman be excused on payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. STILLWELL, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer for your absence?

Mr. STILLWELL. About half past four o'clock, the usual time for adjournment, I left the House, being quite hungry. I went to my hotel to get my dinner, expecting to return afterward if the House should remain in session. While at the hotel I was called for by an officer of the House and brought up here in a carriage—a mode of conveyance which I do not often use.

Mr. INGERSOLL. Would it not be in order to move that all the culprits at the bar be excused en masse? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot recognize that they are culprits. They are members who have been absent from the session of the House without leave. Each gentleman has the right to render his excuse. Some gentlemen may have been absent on account of illness.

Mr. JULIAN. I move that my colleague, Mr. STILLWELL, be excused on the payment of the usual fine.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BEAMAN, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

A MEMBER, (to Mr. BEAMAN.) Throw yourself on the mercy of the court.

Mr. BEAMAN. No, sir; I propose to justify my conduct. Mr. Speaker, I am not entirely satisfied that I have been disobeying or disregarding any of the rules of this House in being absent in this instance without leave. During the Thirty-Seventh and the Thirty-Eighth Congress I was absent only three days, and in those instances my absence was in consequence of serious sickness in my family. During the last session I was absent, I think, three days at one time, and afterward about two weeks, in consequence of sickness. I make these remarks for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the fact that, as I suppose, I know more of the common law of this House than most other gentlemen here present. During all these six years I have observed closely the proceedings of this House, and I have discovered that we are in the habit of having a very questionable quorum during a great portion of the time. In view of this fact, Mr. Speaker, that we are, day after day, week after week, and month after month without a quorum, you and my fellow-members will readily perceive that I had good reason to suppose it had become the common law of this House not to punish anybody for so purely fictitious a violation of the rules.

Having made this statement, I do not, as my friend has suggested, "throw myself on the mercy of the court," but I suggest that those gentlemen who can show a clearer and a better record than I can will be very proper judges as to the condign punishment to be inflicted upon me.

Mr. NIBLACK. In consideration of the gentleman's good behavior, I move that he be excused upon the payment of the usual fees.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. Mr. Speaker, I think that no fine should be imposed upon the gentleman from Michigan. He has within this session handed over to the Treasurer of the United States more than $500, which he was justly entitled to retain—

Mr. BEAMAN. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Michigan is still under arrest, and cannot call a member to order.

Mr. BEAMAN. I am on my defense; and I submit that I have a right to defend myself.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman, while under arrest and before his case is decided, cannot call a member to order.

Mr. HOTCHKISS. That the gentleman from Michigan has been conscientious in this matter no one can doubt, though he has shown himself more sensitive than other gentlemen of the House.

Mr. BEAMAN. Has the gentleman the right to slander the members of this House? [Laughter.]

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I move to amend the motion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. NIBLACK] by striking out the provision for the payment of the usual fees.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the motion of Mr. NIBLACK, it was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. ANDERSON, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. ANDERSON. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, that I have any very good excuse. I have observed, sir, that in this city a gentleman must be on time if he wants to get anything to eat. I stayed here until half-past four o'clock watching the bad conduct of my Democratic friends until I became so thoroughly disgusted that I thought I would retire.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I call the gentleman to order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. ELDRIDGE] excepts to the remarks of the gentleman from Missouri. The Chair thinks that they are not in order.

Mr. ANCONA. I move that the gentleman from Missouri be excused on the payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. PIKE, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. PIKE. I have no special excuse.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that the gentleman be excused upon the payment of the usual fees.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. The gentleman was so frank in his response to the Chair that I move to amend the motion by striking out the provision for the payment of the usual fees.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, no.

Mr. HIGBY. If we adopt that amendment all the rest of the prisoners will make the same response that they may get off without paying anything. [Laughter.]

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the amendment so as to provide for the payment of half the usual fees.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I withdraw the amendment.

The SPEAKER. The amendment being withdrawn, the amendment to the amendment falls.

The motion of Mr. BROOMALL was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a privileged question. I wish to know from the Chair what is the amount of the usual fines.

The SPEAKER. That is not a privileged question. The Chair will state, however, that the amount is not very large. The members interested will readily ascertain the amount.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I would like to know whether this fund goes into the Treasury of the United States or into the hands of officers of this House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will find all the information he desires on this subject on page 176 of the Digest.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. Well, I will not press the inquiry.

The SPEAKER. Mr. PLANTS, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. PLANTS. I believe I have no sufficient excuse. I think, however, I shall have to put in a plea to the jurisdiction of the court. I left the House, I acknowledge, for the purpose of fulfilling a previous appointment; but I came back promptly, without any notification and without any compulsion. I was not brought back in a carriage nor under any warrant. I went away quietly and voluntarily, and I came back in the same manner. I knew nothing of all these proceedings until I was met at the door by an officer of the House and informed that I was under arrest. When I left I supposed there was no special reason why I need remain. I have no other excuse to present.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I move that the gentleman be excused on the payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. McRUER, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer for your absence?

Mr. McRUER. None. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRIS. I move that the gentleman be excused on the payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. JAMES R. HUBBELL, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. HUBBELL, of Ohio. I remained here until half past four o'clock, when it was understood that the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BOWTWELL] would make a motion to adjourn, which would be adopted. I remained in the House until the motion to adjourn was made. I then left supposing that the House would adjourn immediately. This is all the excuse I have to present.

Mr. FINCK. I move that my colleague be excused on the payment of the usual fine.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. STARR, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. STARR. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be discharged from arrest on the ground of my privilege as a member. The Constitution provides that members shall be privileged from arrest while going to and returning from the sessions of the House. [Laughter.] I had been home, and was returning when I was arrested. [Renewed laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the point raised by the gentleman. The same Constitution which the gentleman has quoted provides that less than a quorum of either House shall have the power to compel the attendance of absent members. The House has prescribed this method of compelling their attendance.

Mr. STARR. There was no compulsion necessary in my case. I was at the door desiring to come in.

Mr. MILLER. I move that the gentleman be excused on the payment of the usual fees.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I rise to a question of order. Is it not competent for the Speaker to issue a general amnesty proclamation to all these culprits? [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. It is not.

The motion of Mr. MILLER was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BIDWELL, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to render for your absence?

Mr. BIDWELL. Early in the day I notified my committee of a meeting to-morrow morning. It was necessary that I should have time to prepare certain papers in order to be ready for the meeting of the committee.

That is my main reason. The next reason is that I saw it was a question of filibustering, and being no filibuster, having no sympathy with filibustering, I did not think I could do any good by remaining, especially as I supposed the House would adjourn. That is all of my excuse.

Mr. MILLER. I move that the gentleman be excused on payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BAXTER, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BAXTER. I have no excuse to offer.

Mr. PERHAM. I move the gentleman be excused on payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I remained here until half past four, and supposed the House was about to adjourn when I left.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I move the gentleman be excused on payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SCHENCK. Will it be in order to move that the fees paid by absentees shall be devoted to pay for the dinners of the members who have remained? [Laughter.]

Mr. HOGAN. That is right.

The SPEAKER. The fees are provided for in the statutes, and an order of the House cannot suspend the operation of the statutes.

The SPEAKER. Mr. HART, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. HART. I have no excuse. I remained here until five o'clock, and aided in filibustering until the gentleman from Massachusetts voted for the adjournment three times, and then I left, supposing the House would soon adjourn.

Mr. RADFORD. I move that my colleague be excused on the payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. WARNER, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. WARNER. No excuse. I remained here until I thought all of us ought to be at home.

Mr. DEMING. I move that my colleague be excused on the payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. BARKER, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. BARKER. None.

Mr. BROOMALL. I move that my colleague be excused on payment of the usual fees.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. MAYNARD, you have been absent without leave of the House. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. MAYNARD. It was important to my personal matters I should spend the evening in my room writing. I left at a pretty late hour and took one of my colleagues on the other side with me; and as an appeal to the magnanimity and generosity of the House I will say I gathered up a distinguished gentleman of Massachusetts, whom I have here to exhibit. [Laughter.]

Mr. MORRIS. I move the gentleman be excused on payment of the fees.

The motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER. Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts, you have been absent from the House without its leave. What excuse have you to offer?

Mr. RICE, of Massachusetts. I retired to the room of the Committee on Naval Affairs when I supposed the final vote was being taken on the adjournment, and after some twenty minutes went home. Finding the House had not adjourned I returned voluntarily, and am not under arrest, so far as I know.

Mr. CULLOM. I move that the gentleman be excused on payment of fees.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BINGHAM moved to dispense with all further proceedings under the call.

Mr. FINCK demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken; it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 74, nays 55, not voting 62; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Baxter, Bingham, Boutwell, Brandegee, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cullom, Dawson, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eckley, Eliot, Farquhar, Goodyear, Griswold, Hale, Hawkins, Hayes, Hill, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Hunter, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, Ketcham, Kootz, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Lynch, Marshall, Marston, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, Mercur, Miller, Myers, Newell, O'Neill, Paine, Pike, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Scofield, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spaulding, Francis Thomas, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, James F. Wilson, and Winfield—74.

NAYS—Messrs. Ancona, Anderson, Banks, Barker, Beaman, Bergen, Bidwell, Boyer, Broomall, Campbell, Cook, Cooper, Deming, Driggs, Eggleston, Eldridge, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Higby, Hise, Hogan, Humphrey, Kerr, Le Blond, Longyear, McRuer, Morris, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, O'Neill, Orth, Perham, Plants, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Shanklin, Starr, Stilwell, Strouse, Nelson Taylor, Trimble, Upson, Warner, Wentworth, and Williams—55.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Benjamin, Blaine, Blow, Broomall, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Defrees, Denison, Dumont, Farnsworth, Garfield, Aaron Harding, Harris, Henderson, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Hulburt, Johnson, Jones, Kelley, Kuykendall, Latham, William Lawrence, Leftwich, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Patterson, Phelps, Pomeroy, John H. Rice, Ross, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Stevens, Stokes, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge, and Wright—62.

So all further proceedings under the call were dispensed with, and the doors were reopened.

The question recurred on the motion that the bill be laid on the table, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. FINCK. I move that the House adjourn, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

On ordering the yeas and nays, there were—yeas twenty-five.

Mr. BROOMALL demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. BROOMALL and HISE.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas thirty-two; noes not counted.

So (one fifth of the members present having voted in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was decided in the negative—yeas 84, noes 99, not voting 58; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Beaman, Bergen, Bidwell, Boyer, Campbell, Conkling, Cooper, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hale, Aaron Harding, Hart, Hise, Holmes, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hunter, Kuykendall, Marshall, McKuer, Morrill, Nicholson, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Scofield, Shanklin, Stilwell, Taber, Trimble, Trowbridge, Andrew H. Ward, Whaley, and Winfield—84.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburt, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelso, Kerr, Ketcham, Kootz, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, Mercur, Miller, Moorhead, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Noel, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Plants, Price, Radford, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Sloan, Spaulding, Starr, Strouse, Francis Thomas, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, and James F. Wilson—99.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Defrees, Denison, Dumont, Eldridge, Farnsworth, Garfield, Harris, Henderson, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kelley, Latham, William Lawrence, Leftwich, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Stevens, Stokes, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Woodbridge and Wright—58.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred on the motion to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. HILL. The House having once refused to-day to adjourn to meet on Thursday next, I inquire if it is again in order to make it.

The SPEAKER. It is in order, having been renewed at a subsequent stage after the vote has been taken on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. RADFORD. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. PAINE. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and the Chair appointed Messrs. PLANTS and HUNTER.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas thirty-one; noes not counted.

So (one fifth of the members present having voted in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask to be excused from voting.

Mr. RADFORD. I demand the yeas and nays on excusing the gentleman.

The SPEAKER. The question cannot be taken by yeas and nays to excuse a member from voting on a motion to adjourn.

Mr. FINCK. I move that the House now take a recess till ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain that, because a motion to adjourn till a day fixed has priority.

Mr. ANCONA. I move a call of the House, and on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. ROGERS. Upon that motion I ask to be excused from voting; and upon that I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion of the gentleman; otherwise, as members will see, during the pending of a motion to adjourn, or of any question growing out of it, a hundred members might ask to be excused from voting, and the yeas and nays might be ordered in each case, and so piled up that the House could not adjourn even if a majority should wish to do so. Therefore the Chair cannot entertain the motion of the gentleman from New Jersey, [Mr. ROGERS.]

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to say to the House that if there can be a general understanding by which a vote can be had upon this bill after the reading of the Journal to-morrow, or say at the end of the morning hour, I think a motion to adjourn would be consented to by this side of the House.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. With one hour allowed for debate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I will restate my proposition in the original form in which I proposed it. It is that if we can have a general understanding that the House will come to a vote upon this bill to-morrow immediately after the reading of the Journal, I will move to adjourn.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. The vote to-morrow to be taken without any debate whatever?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. No debate would be in order, for the previous question is now pending.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent.

Mr. FINCK. I object.

The question was upon the motion for a call of the House, upon which the yeas and nays had been demanded.

Mr. GRINNELL. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GRINNELL and KERR were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported that there were—yeas twenty-seven; noes not counted.

So (the affirmative being one fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BOYER. Is a motion to adjourn now in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not, because the pending motion to fix the hour to which the House will adjourn takes precedence of the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 19, nays 109, not voting 63; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Bidwell, Boyer, Campbell, Dawson, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Aaron Harding, Hise, Hunter, Kerr, Shanklin, Stilwell, Trimble, Andrew H. Ward, Warner, and Winfield—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cooper, Cullom, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Goodyear, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hart, Hawkins, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Hulburt, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Kootz, Kuykendall, Laffin, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, Mercur, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Noel, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spaulding, Starr, Strouse, Taber, Nelson Taylor, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—109.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Blaine, Blow, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Defrees, Delano, Denison, Dumont, Farnsworth, Ferry, Garfield, Harris, Henderson, Holmes, Asahel W. Hubbard, Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Ketcham, Latham, William Lawrence, Leftwich, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, Patterson, Phelps, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stevens, Stokes, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Robert T. Van Horn, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Wright—63.

So a call of the House was not ordered.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, said: I desire to state that Mr. HENDERSON is so unwell as to be unable to leave his room.

Mr. FINCK. I wish now to submit a proposition to the House. We on this side of the House appreciate very fully that we are unable to resist the final passage of this bill; and we have not sought during the day to interrupt the proper business of legislation, except for the purpose of obtaining an opportunity to be heard upon the bill; and we now say to the gentlemen who have the charge of the bill that if they will agree to adjourn now, with the understanding that we are to have an hour for debate immediately after the reading of the Journal to-morrow we will consent.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I object.

The question was upon the motion that when the House adjourn to-day it be to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. LE BLOND. I move to amend that motion by striking out "Thursday" and inserting "Friday."

Mr. ANCONA. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. HIGBY. I would like to submit the proposition that, instead of taking an hour to-morrow morning, it be taken now.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. We are a little out of breath now.

Mr. HIGBY. That shows how ready you are for a compromise.

Mr. HISE. I ask the House to excuse me from further attendance on to-day's session.

No objection was made; and Mr. HISE was excused.

The question was upon ordering the yeas and nays upon the motion of Mr. LE BLOND.

Mr. LYNCH. I call for tellers upon ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. LYNCH and COOPER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported that there were—ayes thirty; noes not counted.

So (the affirmative being one fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. I may be permitted to do so, I will make a suggestion which, perhaps, may meet with approval. It seems that it is desired to debate this bill which has already passed its third reading. I suggest, that as this is a very full House, and there is a very full attendance in the galleries, by common consent we devote the remainder of the present session of the House to the discussion of this bill, and continue it to as late an hour as may be desired, with the understanding that the vote on the passage of the bill shall be taken to-morrow after the morning hour.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I object.

The question was taken on Mr. LE BLOND's amendment; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 10, nays 110, not voting 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hogan, Hunter, Le Blond, Shanklin, and Stilwell—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bidwell, Boutwell, Boyer, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cooper, Cullom, Dawson, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hooper, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburt, Humphrey, Ingersoll, Jencks, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Koontz, Kuykendall, Ladin, Loan, Longyear, Marston, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starr, Taber, Nelson Taylor, Trimble, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—110.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Bundy, Campbell, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Defrees, Denison, Donnelly, Dumont, Farnsworth, Garfield, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Hise, Holmes Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kerr, Ketcham, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Leftwich, Lynch, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, McKuer, Neill, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, William H. Randall, Ross, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stevens, Stokes, Strouse, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, and Wright—71.

So the amendment was disagreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. ELDRIDGE's motion, that when the House adjourns it adjourn to meet on Thursday next.

Mr. BOYER. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order, because a motion to fix the time to which the House shall adjourn, has priority of a simple motion to adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I desire to withdraw my objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. MAYNARD.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state that proposition again. It is that the remainder of this day's session be devoted exclusively to debate upon this bill, and that the vote shall be taken on the passage of the bill to-morrow, immediately after the morning hour, without further dilatory motions.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I desire to say, in response to the gentleman from Tennessee, that those gentlemen who desired to debate this question are completely exhausted by the labors of this day. They cannot speak to-night. They have had no dinner, having had to remain here all day, and they simply ask that you shall give them one hour to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from Wisconsin object to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. FINCK. I do.

Mr. HILL. I move that these gentlemen have leave to print all they desire to say upon this question.

Mr. FINCK. We ask no such right.

Mr. LE BLOND. No, sir.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection, and the leave is granted.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to amend the pending motion so as to provide that when the House adjourn it adjourn to meet on Saturday next.

The SPEAKER. That would not be constitutional. [Laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Then say on Friday at ten o'clock.

The SPEAKER. It would require unanimous consent to change the rule that the House do meet at twelve o'clock each day.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. That will not be in order until after the morning hour on next Monday.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Well, then, let us go on and vote on the pending proposition; I do not care what it is so long as it occupies time.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 14, nays 96, not voting 81; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boyer, Campbell, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Le Blond, Niblack, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, and Winfield—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Baker, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Boutwell, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cooper, Cullom, Dawson, Dixon, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Grinnell, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Hayes, Higby, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Hulburt, Hunter, Ingersoll, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Kuykendall, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, McKuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starr, Taber, Nelson Taylor, Trimble, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, Williams, James F. Wilson, and Woodbridge—96.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, Delos R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Banks, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Denison, Dodge, Donnelly, Dumont, Farnsworth, Garfield, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Hill, Hise, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Humphrey, Jencks, Johnson, Jones, Kerr, Latham, William Lawrence, Leftwich, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, Neill, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, John H. Rice, Ross, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stevens, Stilwell, Stokes, Strouse, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburn, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Wright—89.

So the motion of Mr. ELDRIDGE was not agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion that the bill be laid on the table, on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to make a correction of the Associated Press report of yesterday's proceedings of this House. This is a question personal to myself. I am reported as having said in the speech which I made last night—

Mr. UPSON. I rise to a question of order. I submit that this is not a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. TRIMBLE] is out of order. In the first place, it is not a question of privilege to correct the Associated Press report; and in the second place, the gentleman cannot take the floor pending the motion to lay the bill on the table, unless he moves to adjourn or to fix a time to which the House shall adjourn.

Mr. TRIMBLE. Can I not make the statement by unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER. Only by unanimous consent.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. UPSON. I object.

Mr. FINCK. I appeal from the decision of the Chair that this is not a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair decides further that, pending the motion to lay the bill on the table, no gentleman can take the floor for debate on a question of privilege or for a personal explanation, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. FINCK. I appeal from the decision of the Chair; and on that question I call for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The question is, Shall the decision of the Chair stand as the judgment of the House?

Mr. PAINE. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PAINE and FINCK were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-six, noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANCONA. I move that the appeal be laid on the table.

Mr. FINCK. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. ECKLEY. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ECKLEY and CAMPBELL were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-six; noes not counted.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will state the question. The gentleman from Ohio claims it is a question of privilege to correct the report of the Associated Press. The Chair decides it is not, and that even if it were it could not be entertained pending the motion that the bill be laid upon the table, except by unanimous consent. From this decision the gentleman appeals, and the gentleman from Pennsylvania moves the appeal be laid upon the table.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 112, nays 1, not voting 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Anderson, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bergen, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Campbell, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cooper, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Grinnell, Hogan, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Hayes, Higby, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Jencks, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Kerr, Ketcham, Koontz, Kuykendall, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, Le Blond, Loan, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, Maynard, McClurg, McIndoe, McKuer, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Niblack, Nicholson, Neill, O'Neill, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Price, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starr, Strouse, Taber, Nelson Taylor, Francis Thomas, Trimble, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Williams, James F. Wilson, Winfield, and Woodbridge—112.

NAYS—Mr. Ritter—1.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Arnell, Delos

R. Ashley, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Bidwell, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cullom, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deffrees, Deming, Denison, Dumont, Farnsworth, Garfield, Griswold, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Hill, Hise, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Jones, Latham, William Lawrence, Leftwich, Marshall, Marvin, McCullough, McKee, Orth, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, John H. Rice, Ross, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stevens, Stillwell, Stokes, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trowbridge, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Welker, Wentworth, Whaley, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, and Wright—77.

So the appeal was laid upon the table.

Mr. NIBLACK. I ask to be excused from voting on the pending question; and demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANCONA moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved that when the House adjourns to-day, it adjourn to meet on Friday next, and demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. BENJAMIN demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. BENJAMIN and Mr. NICHOLSON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes twenty-six.

So (more than one fifth of those present having voted in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FINCK moved to strike out "Friday" and insert "Thursday," and demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FINCK. I move there be a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) It is not in order.

Mr. FINCK. I appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair cannot entertain the appeal.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 3, nays 93, not voting 95; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bergen, Boyer, and Niblack—3.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Benjamin, Bingham, Boutwell, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Delano, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Farquhar, Ferry, Glessbrenner, Grinnell, Griswold, Hale, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Henderson, Higby, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClurg, McIndoe, Mercer, Miller, Moorhead, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Nowell, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Price, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starr, Francis Thomas, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, James F. Wilson, and Stephen F. Wilson—92.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Beaman, Bidwell, Blaine, Blow, Bundy, Campbell, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cooper, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deffrees, Denison, Dumont, Eldridge, Eliot, Farnsworth, Finck, Garfield, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, Hart, Hayes, Hill, Hise, Hogan, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kerr, Koontz, Latham, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Leftwich, Loan, Marshall, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, McKee, Noell, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stevens, Stillwell, Stokes, Strouse, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thayer, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—96.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. BERGEN. I move a call of the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order during the pending of a motion to adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will not entertain such an appeal pending the question on the motion to adjourn, otherwise the House might remain in session against the will of the majority.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. The motion to adjourn having been voted down, and there appearing to be no quorum present, at what other time would a call of the House be proper if not now?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion that has been just voted down was to adjourn till Thursday next; the pending motion is simply to adjourn, and no call of the House can now be entertained.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the Chair decide that a call of the House is not in order on the motion to adjourn to a day certain?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair decides that a call of the House is not in order during the pendency of a motion to adjourn.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Does the Chair decide that the House can fix a day to which it will adjourn other than to-morrow without a quorum?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Less than a quorum can adjourn simply; it requires a quorum to adjourn till some other day. The motion pending is to adjourn, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, it was decided in the negative—yeas 8, nays 73, not voting 110; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Farnsworth, Hale, Hogan, McRuer, Miller, Niblack, Nicholson, and Taber—8.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anderson, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Benjamin, Brandegee, Broomall, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cullom, Deming, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Grinnell, Griswold, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Higby, Hill, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Jenckes, Julian, Kelley, Kelso, Ketcham, Ladin, George V. Lawrence, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, McIndoe, Mercer, Moorhead, Morrill, Moulton, Myers, Nowell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Spalding, Starr, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, and James F. Wilson—73.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Ancona, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Beaman, Boyer, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Boutwell, Boyer, Bromwell, Buckland, Bundy, Campbell, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Cooper, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Dawson, Deffrees, Delano, Denison, Driggs, Dumont, Eckley, Eldridge, Finck, Garfield, Glessbrenner, Goodyear, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hart, Hayes, Henderson, Hise, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel H. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kerr, Koontz, Kuykendall, Latham, William Lawrence, Le Blond, Leftwich, Loan, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, McKee, Morris, Noell, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Ritter, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Shanklin, Shellabarger, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stevens, Stillwell, Stokes, Strouse, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Nelson Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Trowbridge, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Warner, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Whaley, Williams, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—110.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, (at ten o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.,) moved a call of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The roll was accordingly called, and the following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Anderson, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Blaine, Bromwell, Bundy, Chanler, Davis, Dawes, Deffrees, Dumont, Garfield, Aaron Harding, Hart, Holmes, Hooper, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Kasson, Latham, George V. Lawrence, Leftwich, Loan, Marshall, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, McKee, Moorhead, Phelps, Pomeroy, Ross, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stillwell, Stokes, Nathaniel G. Taylor, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, William B. Washburne, Wentworth, Stephen F. Wilson, Woodbridge, and Wright.

Mr. HALE. I rise to a privileged motion: that the House do now adjourn.

The question being put, there were—ayes 23, noes 52.

Mr. ANCONA demanded tellers.

Mr. BROOMALL. I desire to submit a proposition that I think ought to meet the approbation of the House.

Several MEMBERS. No compromise.

Mr. BROOMALL. Hear my proposition. Certain gentlemen on the other side desire to be heard on the pending bill, and it seems to me but fair that they should have an opportunity. I therefore propose that the vote be taken at once upon the bill, and that those gentlemen be allowed to print their remarks in the National Intelligencer at their own expense. [Great laughter.]

Mr. ELDRIDGE. That is as much as you could expect from that gentleman.

Mr. BROOMALL. Is the proposition accepted?

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Oh, of course it is accepted. [Laughter.]

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. KETCHAM and ANCONA were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 20, noes 50.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The doors of the Hall were then closed, and the Clerk proceeded to call the list of the absentees for excuses:

GEORGE W. ANDERSON. No excuse offered.

JAMES M. ASHLEY. No excuse offered.

JOHN D. BALDWIN. No excuse offered.

JAMES G. BLAINE. No excuse offered.

HENRY P. H. BROMWELL. No excuse offered.

HEZEKIAH S. BUNDY. No excuse offered.

JOHN W. CHANLER. No excuse offered.

THOMAS T. DAVIS. No excuse offered.

HENRY L. DAWES. No excuse offered.

EBENEZER DUMONT.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. General DUMONT is sick and unable to be present. I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

JAMES A. GARFIELD.

Mr. GRINNELL. I present the same excuse on behalf of General GARFIELD that was presented before by General SCHENCK, his family difficulties. I move that he be excused.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I do not think General GARFIELD is very sick. He has certainly had time to get well, and to say that he has difficulties in his family is an imputation which the gentleman from Iowa ought to withdraw. [Laughter.]

The question was taken on Mr. GRINNELL's motion, and it was sustained.

AARON HARDING.

Mr. RITTER. My colleague, Mr. HARDING, being quite unwell, retired to his lodging a few moments ago, and I hope the House will excuse him. I move that he be excused.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 63, noes 30.

Mr. FINCK. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. LE BLOND. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. GRINNELL and BOYER were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 26, noes 2.

So (one fifth of those present voting in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 87, nays 10, not voting 94; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Bingham, Boutwell, Boyer, Buckland, Campbell, Cobb, Cook, Cooper, Cullom, Dawson, Delano, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eldridge, Eliot, Ferry, Glessbrenner, Grinnell, Hawkins, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Ketcham, Koontz, Ladin, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, McIndoe, McRuer, Mercer, Miller, Morrill, Morris, Moulton, Nowell, Niblack, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Patterson, Perham, Pike, Plants, Price, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Ritter, Rollins, Schenck, Shellabarger, Starr, Strouse, Taber, Nelson Taylor, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburne, Welker, Whaley, Williams, and James F. Wilson—87.

NAYS—Messrs. Bergen, Finck, Goodyear, Hunter, Le Blond, Noell, Rogers, Sawyer, Shanklin, and Trimble—10.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Bidwell, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Bundy, Chanler, Reader W. Clarke, Sidney Clarke, Conkling, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Deffrees, Deming, Denison, Dumont, Farnsworth, Farquhar, Garfield, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Abner C. Harding, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Hise, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel H. Hubbard, James R. Hubbell, Hulburd, Humphrey, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Leftwich, Loan, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, McKee, Moorhead, Myers, Phelps, Pomeroy, Radford, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Ross, Rousseau, Scofield

Sitgreaves, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Stilwell, Stokes, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—94.

So Mr. HARDING, of Kentucky, was excused from further attendance during to-day's session.

Mr. SPALDING, I move that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. ANCONA. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. NOELL (at eleven o'clock and fifty five minutes p. m.) moved that the House adjourn.

The question was taken; and upon a division, there were—yeas 32, noes 58.

So the motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. SPALDING, that further proceedings under the call be dispensed with.

Mr. SPALDING. I withdraw that motion. The Clerk resumed the call of the list of absentees for excuses.

ROSSELL HART. No excuse offered.

SIDNEY T. HOLMES. No excuse offered.

SAMUEL HOOPER.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. HOOPER, of Massachusetts, is a member of the Committee of Ways and Means, which committee has leave to sit during the sessions of the House. He left the House a short time ago, saying that as a sub-committee he had to prepare a matter for the committee by the time it meets tomorrow. I therefore move that he be excused.

The motion was not agreed to.

EDWIN N. HUBBELL. No excuse offered.

JAMES R. HUBBELL. No excuse offered.

JOHN A. KASSON. No excuse offered.

GEORGE R. LATHAM. No excuse offered.

GEORGE V. LAWRENCE. No excuse offered.

JOHN W. LEFTWICH.

Mr. COOPER. My colleague, Mr. LEFTWICH, is in very feeble health, and has been for some weeks past.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. He is perfectly well, I know. [Laughter.] He has been here a long time to-day.

Mr. COOPER. I move that my colleague, Mr. LEFTWICH, be excused.

Mr. ROGERS. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GRINNELL. I call for tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ROGERS and PRICE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas twenty-three; noes not counted.

So (the affirmative being one fifth of the last vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GRINNELL. I ask leave to make a statement. I understand there will be no objection to taking a vote to-morrow without any dilatory motions. Therefore I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. We have made no such proposition.

Mr. FINCK. There is no such understanding.

Mr. GRINNELL. Then I withdraw my motion to adjourn.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I desire to make a motion. It is now after midnight—

The SPEAKER pro tempore, (Mr. ROLLINS in the chair.) Debate is not in order.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I am satisfied we will reach a vote sooner by an adjournment till to-morrow.

Mr. SCHENCK. How does the gentleman know that? We have no assurance to that effect from the other side.

Mr. INGERSOLL. I do not want any more assurance than I have.

Mr. UPSON. You have enough already. [Laughter.]

Mr. INGERSOLL. I make the motion that the House adjourn.

Mr. ANCONA. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ANCONA and TROWBRIDGE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas 46, noes 51.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I desire to ask unanimous consent to be excused from further attendance on the session of the House to-night. I have been unwell all day. I received an injury this morning from a fall, and it has been with the utmost inconvenience that I have remained here.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the gentleman from Iowa will be excused.

There was no objection.

Mr. SPALDING. I also ask unanimous consent to be excused from further attendance to-night.

Several MEMBERS objected.

The question recurred on the motion of Mr. COOPER, that Mr. LEFTWICH be excused; on which the yeas and nays had been ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 72, nays 16, not voting 103; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Boutwell, Boyer, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cooper, Cullom, Dixon, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eliot, Ferry, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Julian, Ketcham, Laffin, Longyear, Lynch, McClurg, McIndoe, McRuer, Mercur, Miller, Morris, Moulton, Newell, Nicholson, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Ritter, Sawyer, Shellabarger, Spalding, Starr, Strouse, Taber, Nelson Taylor, Trowbridge, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, and Whaley—72.

NAYS—Messrs. Barker, Bergen, Bidwell, Dawson, Eldridge, Farquhar, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Koykendall, Le Blond, Niblack, Shanklin, Trimble, and Warner—16.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Bundy, Campbell, Chanler, Sidney Clark, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Defrees, Delano, Deming, Denison, Dodge, Dumont, Eggleston, Farnsworth, Garfield, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Hise, Holmes, Hooper, Hotchkiss, Asahel W. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Humphrey, Hunter, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kelley, Kelso, Kerr, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Leftwich, Loan, Marshall, Marston, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, McKee, Moorhead, Morrill, Myers, Neell, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Samuel J. Randall, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rogers, Rollins, Ross, Rousseau, Schenck, Scofield, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stevens, Stilwell, Stokes, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, Williams, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—103.

So Mr. LEFTWICH was excused.

Mr. BOUTWELL. Believing that by adjourning now we shall save the legislative day to-morrow, I move that the House adjourn.

Mr. EGGLESTON. On that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 48, nays 55, not voting 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Bergen, Bidwell, Boutwell, Boyer, Campbell, Conkling, Cooper, Dawson, Dodge, Eckley, Eldridge, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hawkins, Hogan, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Julian, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Laffin, Le Blond, Marston, McRuer, Miller, Morrill, Niblack, Nicholson, Neell, Samuel J. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Ritter, Rogers, Shanklin, Spalding, Strouse, Taber, Nelson Taylor, Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, and Whaley—48.

NAYS—Messrs. Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Delano, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Kelso, Koyntz, Lynch, McClurg, McIndoe, Mercur, Morris, Moulton, Newell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Plants, Price, William H. Randall, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Starr, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, and Williams—55.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Bromwell, Broomall, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clark, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Defrees, Deming, Denison, Dixon, Dumont, Farnsworth, Garfield, Griswold, Hale, Harding, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Hise, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Jenckes, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kelly, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Leftwich, Loan, Longyear, Marshall, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, McKee, Moorhead, Myers, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Raymond, John H. Rice, Ross, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stevens, Stilwell, Stokes, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—88.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will proceed to call the roll of absentees for excuses.

BENJAMIN F. LOAN. No excuse offered.

SAMUEL S. MARSHALL. No excuse offered.

JAMES M. MARVIN. No excuse offered.

HORACE MAYNARD. No excuse offered.

HIRAM MCCULLOUGH. No excuse offered.

SAMUEL MCKEE. No excuse offered.

JAMES K. MOORHEAD. No excuse offered.

CHARLES E. PHELPS. No excuse offered.

THEODORE M. POMEROY. No excuse offered.

LEWIS W. ROSS. No excuse offered.

LOVELL H. ROUSSEAU. No excuse offered.

CHARLES SITGREAVES. No excuse offered.

THAMAR C. SLOAN. No excuse offered.

THADDEUS STEVENS.

Mr. MORRILL. I move that Mr. STEVENS be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

THOMAS N. STILLWELL. No excuse offered.

WILLIAM B. STOKES. No excuse offered.

NATHANIEL G. TAYLOR. No excuse offered.

M. RUSSELL THAYER.

Mr. HOGAN. It has been stated that Mr. THAYER is detained at home by sickness in his family, and I therefore move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

FRANCIS THOMAS.

Mr. ECKLEY. I move that Governor THOMAS be excused: He is old and I believe not very well.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I hope that will be agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion is agreed to.

Mr. LE BLOND. I demanded the yeas and nays before the Chair announced the motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is too late.

Mr. LE BLOND. I appeal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair refuses to entertain the appeal.

Mr. LE BLOND. Upon what authority?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair has made its decision; gentlemen will resume their seats.

Mr. LE BLOND. I will resume my seat when my rights are guaranteed and not short of it. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and demand the question shall be put to the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The occupant of the chair refused to entertain an appeal for this reason: there are certain questions which the Chair must decide absolutely. Where three or four gentlemen rise and claim the floor the Chair must determine which gentleman is entitled to it, and there is no appeal. And the Chair must decide in reference to gentlemen rising in time to demand the yeas and nays, and there is no appeal.

The gentleman has the right to move to reconsider the vote if he thinks his right has been infringed.

Mr. LE BLOND. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move to reconsider the vote by which the gentleman from Maryland was excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That motion is in order; but the decision of the Chair was correct in declining to receive the appeal of the gentleman after the Chair had declared that the gentleman from Maryland was excused by a vote of the House.

Mr. LE BLOND. With all respect I think the Speaker of the House would have done it. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The gentleman moves to reconsider the vote by which the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. F. THOMAS] was excused from voting.

Mr. FINCK. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. GRINNELL. I demand tellers on ordering the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered, and the Chair appointed Messrs. BAKER and HOGAN.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—yeas twenty-five, noes none.

So (one fifth of the members present having voted in the affirmative) the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken on reconsidering the vote by which the House excused Mr. F. THOMAS, it was decided in the negative—yeas 18, noes 85, not voting 93; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bergen, Eldridge, Finck, Good-year, Humphrey, Kerr, Le Blond, Niblack, Nicholson, Noell, Shanklin, Spalding, and Warner—13.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Ancona, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Benjamin, Boutwell, Boyer, Broomall, Campbell, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Conkling, Cook, Cooper, Cullom, Dawson, Dixon, Dodge, Donnelly, Driggs, Eckley, Eggleston, Eliot, Farquhar, Ferry, Glossbrenner, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hawkins, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hogan, Hotchkiss, Demas Hubbard, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Hunter, Jencks, Julian, Kelso, Ketcham, Koontz, Lafin, Longyear, Lynch, Marston, McClure, McIndoe, McKuer, Mercur, Morris, Moulton, Myers, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Plants, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, Alexander H. Rice, Ritter, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Scofield, Shellabarger, Starr, Strouse, Nelson Taylor, Trimble, Trowbridge, Upson, Burt Van Horn, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, Whaley, and Williams—85.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Bidwell, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Bromwell, Buckland, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Deffrees, Dolano, Deming, Denison, Dumont, Farnsworth, Garfield, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Hise, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Chester D. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kelley, Kerr, Kuykendall, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Leftwich, Loan, Marshall, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, McKee, Moorhead, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Raymond, John H. Rice, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stevens, Stilwell, Stokes, Taber, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Van Aernam, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—93.

The Clerk resumed the call of the roll of absentees for excuses.

JOHN L. THOMAS. No excuse offered.

ANTHONY THORNTON. No excuse offered.

ROBERT T. VAN HORN.

Mr. HOGAN. I move that he be excused. He is absent from the city sick, and he was excused in the early part of the evening.

The motion was agreed to.

ANDREW H. WARD. No excuse offered.

HAMILTON WARD. No excuse offered.

WILLIAM B. WASHBURN. No excuse offered.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. Speaker, I am quite anxious that we should adjourn. We have got an internal revenue bill to act upon in the next few days. The Committee of Ways and Means are very anxious to have the morning for committee work; the tariff bill is to be acted upon, and I have received such assurances that I am satisfied there will be no dilatory motions made to-morrow morning. I therefore move that the House adjourn.

Mr. SCHENCK. What assurances are they? I demand the yeas and nays on the motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question being taken; it was decided in the negative—yeas 38, nays 63, not voting 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ancona, Bergen, Boutwell, Boyer, Campbell, Conkling, Cooper, Dawson, Dixon, Dodge, Eckley, Finck, Glossbrenner, Goodyear, Hawkins, Hogan, John H. Hubbard, Hulburd, Humphrey, Hunter, Kerr, Ketcham, Kuykendall, Lafin, Le Blond, Marston, McKuer, Miller, Morrill, Niblack, Nicholson, Ritter, Scofield, Shanklin, Strouse, Taber, Trowbridge, and Whaley—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Delos R. Ashley, Baker, Banks, Barker, Baxter, Beaman, Bidwell, Broomall, Buckland, Reader W. Clarke, Cobb, Cook, Cullom, Delano, Donnelly, Driggs, Eggleston, Eldridge, Farquhar, Ferry, Grinnell, Abner C. Harding, Hayes, Higby, Hill, Hotchkiss, Chester D. Hubbard, Demas Hubbard, Kelso, Koontz, Longyear, Lynch, McClure, McIndoe, Mercur, Morris, Moulton, Myers, Newell, Noell, O'Neill, Orth, Paine, Perham, Plants, Price, Samuel J. Randall, William H. Randall, John H. Rice, Rollins, Sawyer, Schenck, Shellabarger, Starr, Nelson Taylor, Upson, Van Aernam, Burt Van Horn, Warner, Henry D. Washburn, Welker, and Williams—63.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Benjamin, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Bromwell, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Deffrees, Deming, Denison, Dumont, Eliot, Farnsworth, Garfield, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Hise, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Jencks, Johnson, Jones, Julian, Kasson, Kelley, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Leftwich, Loan, Marshall, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, McKee, Moorhead, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Raymond, Alexander H. Rice, Rogers, Ross, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Spalding, Stevens, Stilwell, Stokes, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Trimble, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Henry B. Washburn, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright—90.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The Clerk resumed the call of the list of absentees for excuses.

STEPHEN F. WILSON. No excuse offered.

WILLIAM WINDOM.

Mr. DONNELLY. I ask that my colleague, Mr. WINDOM, be excused on account of illness in his family.

The motion was agreed to.

FREDERICK E. WOODBRIDGE.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move that the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. WOODBRIDGE] be excused on account of indisposition.

Mr. SCHENCK and Mr. ELDRIDGE. He is well enough.

The motion of Mr. GRINNELL was not agreed to.

EDWIN R. V. WRIGHT. No excuse offered.

Mr. SCHENCK. I now move that a warrant be issued for the arrest of such of the absentees as have not been excused, and that the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring them to the bar of the House.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ALLISON. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know what becomes of the gentlemen who answered to their names on the first call of the roll, and then left the House. Are they to be included within this warrant?

Mr. WARNER. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. Not at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will inform the gentleman that no member has left the Hall within the knowledge of the Chair except upon agreeing to return within five minutes, and not to leave the building.

Mr. ALLISON. I do not think the Chair quite apprehends my question. At the first roll-call a number of members answered to their names and then left the Hall before the doors were closed.

Mr. MORRILL. And some of them went out through the windows.

Mr. CONKLING. Did any go up the chimney? [Laughter.]

Mr. SCHENCK. I state from my personal knowledge, as a member of this House, that certain members who answered at the first call of the roll have since disappeared from the Hall. Now, I move that after the warrant just ordered shall have been issued, and while we are waiting for a return upon it, there be another call of the House, and an additional warrant be issued for those who left immediately upon the first call of the roll. [Cries of "That is right."]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can only be done by dispensing with the present call of the House, as there cannot be two calls of the House at the same time.

Mr. SCHENCK. Then I move to dispense with the present call, and that a new call of the House immediately take place.

Mr. ELIOT. I would ask of the Chair this question: suppose the present warrant be issued, and before the Sergeant-at-Arms make a return upon it the call be dispensed with and then a new call be ordered, would not the effect of that be to bring the absentees named in the present warrant into the House to answer to the second call?

Mr. CONKLING. Those men coming in would be in time to answer to their names under the new call.

Mr. SCHENCK. I withdraw my motion for a new call.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The result desired to be reached can be accomplished by unanimous consent, and all members not answering to their names on the new call, and not excused, can be included in the warrant.

Mr. SCHENCK. I ask unanimous consent that that be done.

No objection was made.

The Clerk then proceeded to call the roll again.

The following members failed to answer to their names:

Messrs. Alley, Ames, Anderson, Arnell, James M. Ashley, Baldwin, Barker, Bingham, Blaine, Blow, Brandegee, Bromwell, Bundy, Chanler, Sidney Clarke, Culver, Darling, Davis, Dawes, Deffrees, Deming, Denison, Dumont, Farnsworth, Garfield, Griswold, Hale, Aaron Harding, Harris, Hart, Henderson, Hise, Holmes, Hooper, Asahel W. Hubbard, Edwin N. Hubbell, James R. Hubbell, Ingersoll, Johnson, Jones, Kasson, Kelley, Latham, George V. Lawrence, William Lawrence, Leftwich, Loan, Marshall, Marvin, Maynard, McCullough, McKee, Moorhead, Patterson, Phelps, Pike, Pomeroy, Radford, Raymond, John H. Rice, Ross, Rousseau, Sitgreaves, Sloan, Stevens, Stilwell, Stokes, Nathaniel G. Taylor, Thayer, Francis Thomas, John L. Thomas, Thornton, Robert T. Van Horn, Andrew H. Ward, Hamilton Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, William B. Washburn, Wentworth, James F. Wilson, Stephen F. Wilson, Windom, Winfield, Woodbridge, and Wright.

Mr. TRIMBLE. My colleague, Mr. WARD, is confined to his room by sickness. He was excused on the first call. If it be necessary to make the motion again I move that he be excused.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MOULTON. I move that warrants issue for all the absentees except those who have been excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. An order of that kind, including all the absentees, has already been made by unanimous consent.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I move that my colleague, Mr. JONES, be excused on account of sickness.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move that my colleague, Mr. A. W. HUBBARD, be excused. He has been absent during the whole session on account of sickness.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. PRICE. I move that the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. HENDERSON] be excused. He is sick.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. ORTH. I move that my colleague, Mr. DUMONT, be excused on account of sickness. The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is informed that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DUMONT] has already been excused.

Mr. SHELLABARGER. I move that my colleague, Mr. WILLIAM LAWRENCE, be excused. He is absent from the city and is sick.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MOULTON. I move that my colleague, Mr. BROMWELL, be excused. He is at home sick.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I move that my colleague, Mr. Blow, be excused. He is detained at home by sickness in his family.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GRINNELL. I move that the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. STEVENS, be excused.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He has already been excused for the entire day.

The Clerk, by direction of the Speaker pro tempore, read the names of the members who had answered on the first call, but who did not respond on the last call. They were as follows: James G. Blaine, John A. Bingham, Augustus Brandegee, Henry C. Deming, John F. Farnsworth, John A. Griswold, Robert S. Hale, Ebon C. Ingersoll, William D. Kelley, James W. Patterson, Frederick A. Pike, William Radford, Henry J. Raymond, John H. Rice, and Charles H. Winfield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Warrants will be issued for the members whose names have just been read.

Mr. VAN AERNAM. I move that my colleague, Mr. HOTCHKISS, be excused from further attendance at the session of to-night, on account of ill-health.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is the gentleman really ill?

Mr. HOTCHKISS. I have been in attendance all day, and I am unable to remain longer. I have already stayed longer than I ought to have done.

The motion of Mr. VAN AERNAM was agreed to. Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania, (after a pause.) I move to reconsider the vote by which the gentleman from New York [Mr. HOTCHKISS] was excused.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question recurred on the motion that Mr. HOTCHKISS be excused.

On the motion, there were—ayes fifty, noes not counted.

So Mr. HOTCHKISS was excused.

Mr. NOELL. I move to postpone all proceedings in regard to the arraignment of the absentees until to-morrow at one o'clock.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman must reduce his amendment to writing.

Mr. NOELL. I cannot do that just now.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Would it be in order for the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GRINNELL] to sing—

"John Brown's body lies a-moldering in the grave.
But his soul is marching on?"

Mr. SCHENCK. Let us have it.

Mr. GRINNELL. I will do it, if the gentleman from Wisconsin will allow me to quote a verse for him to sing.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. What is it?

Mr. GRINNELL. The verse I would quote would be:

"And are we wretches yet alive,
And do we still rebel?
'Tis only by amazing grace
That we are out of hell."

Mr. NIBLACK. That is swearing.

Mr. DRIGGS. I suggest that the gentleman sing—

"Oh, for a thousand tongues to sing!"

Mr. NOELL. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the arraignment before the bar of the House of all persons for being absent without leave be postponed until Wednesday, the 23d, at one o'clock p. m.

Mr. VAN HORN, of New York. I object.

Mr. NOELL. I believe the resolution is in order. A case of this kind came up last year.

Mr. UPSON. I object; last year is played out. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the resolution of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. NOELL.]

Mr. BROOMALL. I move to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word "Resolved" and inserting the following:

That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring the members now absent without leave before the bar of the House as soon hereafter as possible, and that they be then required to show cause why they should not be declared to be in contempt of the House, and to abide the order of the House.

The question was put; and there were—ayes 33, noes 38.

So the amendment was not agreed to.

The question recurred on Mr. NOELL's resolution.

Mr. BROOMALL. I offer the following amendment to the resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring the members now absent without leave, who are not previously arrested, before the bar of the House at one o'clock to-morrow, Wednesday, January 23, 1867; and that they then be required to show cause why they should not be declared to be in contempt of the House, and to abide the orders of the House.

Mr. SCHENCK. I move to lay the resolution and amendment upon the table.

Mr. NOELL. I accept the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken on Mr. SCHENCK's motion; and there were—ayes 39, noes 10.

So the resolution was laid upon the table.

Mr. NOELL. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know whether it is in order to smoke cigars and eat old cheese during the session of the House? [Laughter.]

Mr. McKEE. I ask a division of the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is of opinion that it is not in order.

Mr. TRIMBLE. I feel, Mr. Speaker, no good can result to ourselves or the country by continuing this session longer, and I therefore move that the House adjourn.

Mr. SCHENCK. It would not be respectful to the members we have invited here. [Laughter.]

Mr. BROOMALL. I submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be directed to bring all the members now absent, who shall not be arrested and brought before the bar of the House during this day's session, before the bar of the House at one o'clock p. m., Wednesday, January 23, and they then be required to show cause why they should not be declared in contempt of the House, and they abide the order of the House.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. FINCK. I make the point of order that it is the same resolution already voted down.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair overrules the point of order. It is not the same resolution.

Mr. RANDALL, of Pennsylvania. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. BROOMALL. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. ELDRIDGE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. O'NEILL. I hope we will take a recess till half-past three on the 23d, as these evening sessions are so pleasant and instructive we ought to have more of them.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to take a recess till twelve o'clock m.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not in order pending a call of the House.

Mr. BOYER (at twenty-five minutes to three a. m.) moved that the House adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. NOELL. I move that we direct the Sergeant-at-Arms to bring in the members from Arkansas, who are absent without leave of this House.

Mr. WARNER. That goes under the rule to the joint select Committee on Reconstruction.

Mr. BERGEN. I move that my colleague, Mr. HUNTER, have leave of absence till twelve o'clock m.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

Mr. STARR. I have the manuscript of a sermon delivered by our Chaplain not long ago; and I ask it be read, as I fear there were some members here who did not hear it.

Objection was made.

Mr. HARDING, of Illinois. I move the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Sergeant-at-Arms be instructed to return the writs against absentees under the pending call at nine o'clock a. m. to-day, it being now the hour of three o'clock a. m., until which time this House take a recess.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion for a recess is not in order pending the call of the House.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana, (at five minutes past three o'clock a. m.,) moved that the House adjourn.

Mr. BENJAMIN called for tellers.

Tellers were ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 15, noes 34.

So the House refused to adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. I would like to know what reason the gentleman from Dakota has for being present to-night? Let us hear him.

Mr. SCHENCK. Let us admit him as a State. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURLEIGH. I am sent here as a Delegate of a Territory, and not as a Representative of a State.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. Is Dakota loyal?

Mr. BURLEIGH. It never bowed the knee to the political Baal.

Mr. HILL. What do you mean by loyal?

Mr. BURLEIGH. My people stood by the Government in the hour of trial.

Mr. GRINNELL. How many of them?

Mr. BURLEIGH. I have not the honor to represent a State, but I represent a Territory of which I am as proud as any member can be of his State. If it has not a great population, it has resources to sustain the vast population to go there hereafter. I came here to-night to look after the interest—

A MEMBER. Of Indians? [Laughter.]

Mr. BURLEIGH. Yes, sir; I always look after their interest, and propose to do so.

A MEMBER. So we understand. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURLEIGH. Yes, sir; you understand it; from men who have dyed their hands in fraud and perjury. We have the evidence on this subject, and will show it to this House and to the nation. Yes, sir, I stand here to protect the Indians of the Northwest, and not only the Indians of the Northwest, but of the eastern slope; and I will stand here as long as I can stand at all [great laughter] for the rights of humanity.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. Would it be in order to allow the gentleman to tell us how he votes on the pending measure?

Mr. BURLEIGH. If it is in order I will state that I have always been in favor of organization, and I think—

Mr. ELDRIDGE. How is the gentleman on religion? [Laughter.]

Mr. BURLEIGH. If the majority here had only organized they might have put on two watches, one on the larboard and the other on the starboard side—one on duty while the other one rested—and have fought this thing out; while the minority, being small in number, could not have had enough on the watch to call the yeas and nays.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Indiana. They cannot call them now.

Mr. BURLEIGH. Any more questions?

Mr. GRINNELL. Talk about white people now.

Mr. BURLEIGH. If I had a vote I would vote for the country, the Constitution, and the rights of mankind.

A MEMBER. Do you leave the Constitution around?

Mr. BURLEIGH. I never "swing round the circle." [Laughter.]

Mr. HILL. I insist that the gentleman is not showing cause why he should not go out. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURLEIGH. All I have to say is, if my cause is not sufficient, the officers of the House may try the same means to eject me that they did on the man in the gallery. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. How do you stand on the tax on whisky on hand? [Laughter.]

Mr. HUBBARD, of Connecticut. The speech of the gentleman seems to me entirely satisfactory, and I move it be accepted.

Mr. ELDRIDGE. I move to extend his time ten minutes.
